

From Abdur Rashid
Hawker, Dhurrukhil

INDIA REVISITED

9, Rames Mitter Road,
Bhowanipur, Calcutta

Ballantyne Press
BALLANTYNE, HANSON AND CO.
EDINBURGH AND LONDON

ENTRANCE TO THE ELEPHANTA CAVES

Frontispiece.

INDIA REVISITED

BY

EDWIN ARNOLD, M.A., C.S.I.

AUTHOR OF "THE LIGHT OF ASIA," ETC. ETC.

(REPRINTED, WITH ADDITIONS DESCRIPTIVE AND POETICAL, FROM THE "DAILY TELEGRAPH")

LONDON

TRÜBNER & CO., LUDGATE HILL

1886

[All rights reserved]

CONTENTS.

---

NO.	PAGE
I. ON THE QUEEN'S HIGHWAY . . . . .	I
II. THE MEDITERRANEAN . . . . .	12
III. THE CANAL AND THE RED SEA . . . . .	25
IV. PERIM TO BOMBAY . . . . .	41
V. NEW BOMBAY <sup>o</sup> . . . . .	54
VI. THE GHAUTS AND POONA . . . . .	69
VII. NAUTCH DANCES, PLAYS, AND JEWELS . . . . .	82
VIII. A MODEL NATIVE STATE . . . . .	99
IX. THE MOSQUES OF AHMEDABAD . . . . .	117
X. THE CITY OF VICTORY . . . . .	133
XI. ULWUR TO DELHI . . . . .	161
XII. THE CAMP OF EXERCISE AT DELHI . . . . .	179
XIII. AGRA AND THE TAJ . . . . .	195
XIV. BENARES AND THE LAND OF THE "LIGHT OF ASIA" . . . . .	214
XV. THE "CITY OF PALACES" <sup>o</sup> AND MADRAS . . . . .	237
XVI. CEYLON AND THE BUDDHISTS . . . . .	262
XVII. THE SOUTH COUNTRY AND "OOTY" <sup>o</sup> . . . . .	285
XVIII. HYDERABAD OF THE NIZAM . . . . .	303

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS.

ENTRANCE TO THE ELEPHANTA CAVES . . . . .	Frontispiece
PORT SAID . . . . .	To face page 28
THE SUEZ CANAL . . . . .	32
PILLAR IN ELEPHANTA CAVE . . . . .	63
THE ARDHANARISHWARA, ELEPHANTA CAVES . . . . .	66
BOMBAY, FROM MALABAR HILL . . . . .	68
THE BUND-ROAD, POONA . . . . .	72
POONA, FROM BEYOND THE BUND . . . . .	74
PARVATI'S TEMPLE AND HILL, POONA . . . . .	76
NAUTCH GIRLS AT HOME . . . . .	84
OUR ELEPHANT AT BARODA . . . . .	94
THE QUEEN'S TOMB, AHMEDABAD . . . . .	120
THE KANKARIA TANK, AHMEDABAD . . . . .	124
PALACE AT AMBER, JEYPORE . . . . .	152
THE KASHMIR GATE, DELHI . . . . .	174
THE DIWAN-I-KHAS, DELHI . . . . .	176
THE OLD FORT, DELHI . . . . .	182
THE KUTUB MINAR . . . . .	184
THE JUMMA MUSJID, DELHI . . . . .	194
TOMB OF ITMAD-ODD-DOWLAH, AGRA . . . . .	198
THE TOMB OF AKBAR, SECUNDRA . . . . .	202
ROOF OF ZENANA IN THE FORT, AGRA . . . . .	204
THE TAJ MAHAL, AGRA . . . . .	212
THE MOSQUE AND GHATS, BENARES . . . . .	216
A BURNING GHAT, BENARES . . . . .	218
BUDDHIST STUPA AT SARNATH, BENARES . . . . .	226
CARVING ON TOWER AT SARNATH . . . . .	228
JUGGLERS AT BENARES . . . . .	238
THE EDEN GARDENS, CALCUTTA . . . . .	250
GOVERNMENT HOUSE, MADRAS . . . . .	258
A ROAD IN CEYLON . . . . .	266
THE GREAT BUDDHIST TEMPLE AT KANDY . . . . .	276
SENSATION ROCK (ON THE LINE FROM COLOMBO TO KANDY) . . . . .	284
TOMBS OF THE KINGS AT GOLCONDAH . . . . .	312

9, Rames Mitter Road

INDIA REVISITED.

---

I.

ON THE QUEEN'S HIGHWAY.

"THE sailor sighs, as sinks his native shore." So does the landsman. However pleasant the circumstances of the expedition which take him abroad, however agreeable its anticipations of fair and familiar scenes to be revisited, old associations to become renewed, and new ones profitably created, the fading coasts of England must and will inspire the voyager's mind with a clinging melancholy. A Continental citizen hardly knows at what precise point he has crossed the frontier of his mother-country. The train whirls him past some painted post, some guarded gateway, or some new-fashioned sentry-box, and he is already "abroad." But these Channel seas which roll at the white doorsteps of Britain, and upon which one must embark to quit her, prolong and accentuate leave-taking with every succeeding landmark of grey down and silvery cliff. It is as though an interminable company of dear and faithful friends stood ranged along the coast-line waving adieux which cannot, and

9, Rames Mitter Road

INDIA REVISITED.

---

I.

ON THE QUEEN'S HIGHWAY.

"THE sailor sighs, as sinks his native shore." So does the landsman. However pleasant the circumstances of the expedition which take him abroad, however agreeable its anticipations of fair and familiar scenes to be revisited, old associations to become renewed, and new ones profitably created, the fading coasts of England must and will inspire the voyager's mind with a clinging melancholy. A Continental citizen hardly knows at what precise point he has crossed the frontier of his mother-country. The train whirls him past some painted post, some guarded gateway, or some new-fashioned sentry-box, and he is already "abroad." But these Channel seas which roll at the white doorsteps of Britain, and upon which one must embark to quit her, prolong and accentuate leave-taking with every succeeding landmark of grey down and silvery cliff. It is as though an interminable company of dear and faithful friends stood ranged along the coast-line waving adieux which cannot, and must not, be disregarded. How, indeed, should one turn away indifferently from headland after headland, from woodland, valley, town, and roadstead, when each is so full of memories accumulated in the mind during many bygone years, and when each recalls some happy or at least some interesting events?

So, after a peaceful night at anchor in the mouth of the Thames, it was one long day of perpetual, if unexpressed, farewells all down the Channel for the passengers of the Peninsular and Oriental steamer Parramatta, bound to Bombay. A chill October breeze had set the light green waves dancing, but our powerful vessel of 5000 tons did not deign to move seriously to these land-locked billows; and the greater part of the hundred and fifty ladies, military officers, children, nurses, and travellers embarked for the Indian passage were able to keep the deck as point after point of that well-known and well-loved coast passed into the misty horizon astern. Shakespeare's great bright cliff; the folded downs above Folkestone, half-veiled by sea clouds and half-lighted by pale sunshine; the low chine of Dungeness and the lofty white buttresses of Beachy Head; the faint gleams of houses and hanging smoke, to show where Eastbourne, Hastings, and Brighton sate on the sea's brink,—these, every one of them recalling unforgotten friends and bygone scenes, rise up from the West and glide away into the East, until the Parramatta steams within her own length of the Royal Sovereign Light Ship, steering for the southernmost corner of the Isle of Wight.

There, in the still water under the lee of the Ventnor hills, a yawl is seen tacking about, with the familiar Peninsular and Oriental colours—the four triangles of blue, white, yellow, and red—at her masthead. The huge steamer slackens her speed, and finally stops altogether; the cessation of her immense engines, after such long throbbing upon their course thus far, producing a sensation of impressive silence even amidst the wail of the wind and the seething of the faint-coloured waves. The yawl casts off and sends alongside her dingey, into which our pilot descends, in the proud consciousness of having seen so big a vessel safe through the perils of the narrow seas. He waves an adieu to the ship, and by his departure the last link seems severed with those familiar home shores, which are seen by the eyes of more than one gentle exile among us through a mist apparently not altogether due to the chill autumn weather. But the link hangs by a thread still, for the pilot rises suddenly in the stern-sheets of his receding boat to hail us that he has left a coat behind him. A pilot's coat may contain important papers—it is a special and respected garment. The mighty engines accordingly suspend their re-commencing energies for a moment, in order that somebody may drop the pilot's garment into his outstretched arms. Then he raises his hat from his white hair once more—Channel pilots always wear a black silk hat even in the wildest weather—waves another and a last adieu to captain, ship, and company; and the Parramatta churns the green tideway into foam again with the lash of her screw—heading for Ushant and the Bay of Biscay.

In November it is permitted to the landsman, and yet more, of course, to the landswoman, to be a little anxious about crossing the Bay of Biscay. Even to the least professional eye that "Gulf of Gascony" looks upon the map a terribly open corner of the vast Atlantic. A westerly or south-westerly gale, it is evident, must drive the whole fury of the broad and gloomy ocean upon the shores of France and Spain. In such weather it was that the northern waves of the dreaded Bay engulfed the ill-fated London; that its southern billows capsized and overwhelmed her Majesty's ship Captain; and the bottom of this prodigious inlet must, in fact, be more thickly bestrewn with wrecks and relics of foundered ventures than any other sea in the world. Yet the least seasoned and most nervous passenger on board may take comfort from the strength of our splendid ship and the skill of the officers and crew in charge of her. Old Anglo-Indians will remember, as I do, the vessels of a quarter of a century ago in which they used to cross the Mediterranean, and pursue what was then the newly-developed "Overland Route" down the Red Sea and over the Indian Ocean. Two little steamships especially there were, sailing under the Peninsular and Oriental flag, named the Vectis and the Valetta, which were wont to go almost as much under as over the water, while they plunged with rolling paddles and diving prows from Marseilles to Malta and Alexandria. The Parramatta might almost carry one of those old-fashioned ferry-boats on her deck, which is flush and quite unbroken from the taffrail to the stem, except by surface constructions. Twelve alternate promenades from extreme end to end of this street-like vista afford a walk of a mile, and, over the whole way, from forepeak to taffrail, the well-laid teak planks are always kept as "clean as a new pin," the morning task of the Lascars in fine weather being constantly to tidy up the ship. Her spacious and handsome saloon easily seats 130 first-class passengers at dinner. At night terraces of commodious cabins absorb them for slumber; by day there are for their use and comfort music saloons, libraries, and a luxurious smoking-room forward, lined with slabs of veined white marble, very prettily adorned in the Japanese manner with inlaid gold palm-fronds and flying cranes. It takes days of exploration to know one's way thoroughly about such an immense floating labyrinth, which finds in her endless recesses space, without the least crowding, for an equipage of some 160 officers and hands, including the Asiatic sailors. Captain Anderson, in command of this stately and noble vessel, is not less attentive to the comfort of his enormous family of passengers than to the safety of the ship, the discipline of which is perfect, but maintained in a quiet and British manner. Everybody knows and does his duty, from the veteran commander to the little Bengali boys scouring the screw of the Parramatta's steam pinnace, and to the jet-black Seedees glistening like the coal they shovel into the huge furnaces. It is pleasant to observe how well the native sailors are treated, and how satisfied they appear with their service. The "tindal," a small, wizened, wiry, indefatigable Muslim from Chittagong, with sparse beard reddened by lime and grizzled by many tempests, might have been boatswain to Sinbad, he has such a weather-beaten look. There are brown, lively Bombay men, coffee-coloured Malays, ink-dark Africans, and, most notable of all, an Afghan stoker, while the quiet, patient ayahs glide about like cats, purring Hindustani songs, and ceaselessly watching and fondling the blue-eyed English children, those tender shipmates of our bronzed colonels and captains, married Indian ladies, unmarried belles on their first visit, and travellers for pleasure.

The Bay was forbearing, and did not by any means put forth its utmost power of storm and turmoil. A strong north wind drew down from the chops of the Channel, filling the square sails of the Parramatta, and speeding her along over a rolling but never tempestuous surface at the rate of fifteen miles an hour. The sea, changed now from the meadow-green hue of soundings to the cold, deep, glassy foncé blue of ocean, ran in long glistening hollows, laced with creamy foam, on either side of the flying steamer, the pallid track of which lay broad in her wake far under the grey archway of the sky. As each billow reaches its highest point of elevation the wind seizes the crest and snatches some of it violently to leeward in fine spindrift, upon which the fitful sunlight paints evanescent but lovely little rainbows. The more solid portion falls back upon the sinking breast of the wave in white sheets, which spread out into woven nets and swaying chains of tangled and delicate sea-embroidery, draping the dark purple hollow from ridge to base, till the ocean, seen from certain points, looks as if wine were veiled with curded milk.

Now and again one observes—besides the big gulls which follow the vessel over hundreds of miles for the sake of what food may be cast overboard—flocks of pretty small marine birds, which skim the face of the sea with unwearied pinions, gliding down its moist valleys and ascending its hissing hills, but never wetting a foot or feather. “Mother Carey’s chickens”—also seen occasionally—often touch the water, or light upon it; but these maritime coveys of russet and silver plumage raze the face of ocean as neatly as swallows shoot along a lake. Midway in the Biscay Deep a school of sportive porpoises—the white variety—espy the ship, and join in headlong chase of her, springing out of the water a full half-fathom into the air, and tumbling back again one after the other with a smack and splash into the body of the wave, only to reappear instantly and renew the race. Is it wonder at the big black ship, or wild pride to outstrip her, or the sheer pleasure of healthy fish-life, which prompts these little “pigs of the deep”—the porco-pesci—to try their fins against the bronze blades of the Parramatta’s gigantic screw? Twice or thrice in mid gulf a poor little twittering finch or saffron-breasted Spanish robin flutters to the ship, and sits exhausted on a "swifter" of the shrouds. These are belated migrants, or birds blown off the coast in the dark; and they must oft-times perish by thousands in the pitiless sea. One is so glad to see them conquer their panting terror and stay; and to know that a short spell of rest will enable the tiny tired wings to expand again, and safely reach yonder far coast of Spain, just rising in a dim fawn-coloured sierra—which ends in Cape St. Vincent—over the now deeper roll of the water. While I was crumbling a biscuit for these small "stow-aways," a full-breasted billow sweeping past the ship happens to lift its crest highest just as she dips her waist lowest to the starboard sea. The whole upper body of the wave washes solidly upon deck through the latticed bulwark, and the Parramatta has taken on board her first and only "green sea," wetting more than one pretty foot.

The windy day is followed by a night full of sea-noises; the lashing of the screw, the hiss of the sweeping seas, the thunder of the flapping square sails; but the Parramatta passes at grand speed out of the Bay, and runs down the picturesque coasts of Portugal and Spain, sighting on her passage many a point of interest. Inside those arid hills nestles Corunna; lower down the sails of more than one outward-bound Portuguese bark denote Oporto; the "Berlings," a terror to mariners, are passed; and the Tagus tints the dark Atlantic with lighter waves, flowing forth from the rich vineyards of Estremadura. At sunset the steamer doubles the gilded promontory of Cape St. Vincent, and heads for Trafalgar, of immortal memory;—for who can forget the record connected with these heaving waters, Nelson's long cruise, and glorious sea-fight, and how the shattered but triumphant Victory bore the hero's body under these jealous shores into the friendly shadow of Gibraltar, under the victorious standard of England?

“Time was, when it was praise and boast enough
In every clime, and travel where we might,
That we were born her children!”

Now there are statesmen who would destroy her unity, and make separation from her a boon and a reward!

Audax Iapetum genus! Across these same seas Columbus in his tiny carvels put forth from Cadiz to find the New World, which lay so long unknown nine hundred leagues beyond those clouds of purple and amber, robing the setting orb. The good ship goes towards the “Gates of Hercules” lighted by a splendid sundown. In the west soft masses of tinted vapour, drifting against a background of tender turquoise-green, fleck the sky with wonderful jewel-work of ruby, jacinth, and amethyst. Southwards the heaven is full of violet-grey cumuli bordered and embroidered with tender rose. Through the indigo spaces of the darker east the stars gleam suddenly forth, sparks of diamond, and we are already so far downward in latitude that the Great Bear has dipped its lowest star near to the sea's edge. Orion's Belt shines vertically over the narrowing straits, and constellations new to the eye gem the horizon over the African mainland.

Morning finds the Parramatta steaming close in to Tarifa, its white fortress and pharos backed by cork-woods and the rocks and ravines of yellow hills. On the other hand rise the spurs of Atlas, holding up the sky, as of old; for piles of gathered clouds lie on the head of the ancient range. Then Gibraltar towers over the water, sombre, massive, blue, impregnable, the first of the linked stations along the "Queen's Highway" to India. Those who have never before seen the Rock can survey it to perfection as we glide into the bosom of the bay. The broad western slope of Calpe, illuminated by a brilliant sunrise, displays every crag and pinnacle, every olive and cactus patch, with the grim bastions and gun-platforms frowning from all available ledges; and the town opens on us—yellow, white, red, and brown—cradled in the lap of the great eminence. One thinks anew of the Victory, with her precious burden, dropping anchor here from her wounded and blood-stained bows, and furling the topsails riddled with French and Spanish round-shot. One thinks also of the memorable siege, when all the ships of the Gaul and the Don vainly assailed the British garrison during three years and eight months, and, as a local guide briefly remarks, "were finally dispelled by a judicious use of red-hot shot." The hostile fleets of the whole world could not nowadays lower the ensign which waves on yonder flagstaff by the Governor's quarters.

As the steamer enters we hear the Rock's warlike accents, for a Swedish man-of-war follows us in and fires a salute of seventeen guns to the British flag. The saluting battery ashore returns the compliment with as many discharges, and the echoes of the cannonade roll in thunder-claps of ear-splitting sound from Europa Point to the Neutral Ground, while tongues of sharp bright fire lance the shaken air, and clouds of cannon-smoke drift over the dancing ripple of the bay. What would the voice of this great "Rock" be like, if it spoke from all its thousand iron mouths in anger and defiance? On its western face are ranged all the vast batteries and water-forts, the hidden galleries and armed works from which would spring, against any rash assailant, torrents of flame and tempests of heavy shot and shell. The eastern side, sufficiently fortified by Nature with precipices and scarp'd peaks, dipping into the sea by cliffs of a thousand feet altitude, can be scaled only by sea-birds. A knife edge—upon which sits perched the signal station—divides the Mediterranean from the Atlantic side of the redoubtable Crag, which a Spanish guide-book on board airily describes as a "first-class fortalice of Spain, in the temporary occupation of her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain." When the millennium comes, muy honrado Señor! and everybody has turned Buddhist, you shall have Calpe back again!

II.

THE MEDITERRANEAN.

THE sunshine, which lay broad upon the Great Rock, lighted the Parramatta pleasantly into the Mediterranean. On the eastern side the commanding fortress built by Nature to guard the gates of the Sea of Ulysses hardly needs, as has been observed, a gun or a sentry. It is patrolled by a ceaseless surf which beats upon unsheltered crags, and is defended by unscalable precipices, along the brows of which roads have been engineered, looking from the deck of a passing steamer like mere ledges for sea-birds. Beyond it the waters widen rapidly along the coast of Spain towards Malaga, under a wall of picturesque hills, through the clefts of which are seen the summits of a higher sierra, whitened here and there with early snow. Opposite, and also gradually receding, the African range from Ceuta to Melilla shuts in grandly the bright horizon of the sea, now heaving in such tranquil wavelets that the clouds of rose-colour and gold are reflected in long shadows of the same hues on the surface.

Amid such agreeable weather as this—which must not long be counted upon, however, in November, for any portion of the capricious Mediterranean—our large family of passengers make general holiday. Some pursue with immense devotion the effort to pitch grummets of rope, carefully prepared for the purpose, into buckets set about twelve yards apart. This game of sea-quoits, which is not without its fascinations, depends for success upon a dexterous twist that the player must give to the ring of hemp. Another party gathers with eager excitement in front of a black board marked with numbered and lettered squares, placed upon the deck at a slight slope. The object here is to throw little discs of canvas upon the winning numbers, and keen is the rivalry displayed. Sea-quoits may be diversified by establishing a marline-spike on a stand for the mark, in place of the bucket; but uncommon skill is then required to drop the grummet precisely upon the point, and the movement of the ocean must be slight. On one placid evening of our Mediterranean voyage the younger passengers improvised a dance. The after-deck was cleared of the innumerable chairs which ordinarily encumber it; the electric lamps with which the ship is lighted were clustered under the awning, and an effective, if unpretending, orchestra was mustered by the aid of two stewards, who played flute and fife, and a quartermaster who had quite a remarkable gift upon the violin. The Nereids of the Middle Sea heard with astonishment "The See-Saw Valse," "Blue Danube," "Myosotis," and other terrestrial strains, until the waves themselves took to dancing, and the deck soon became rather too much like the roof of a house for any more of such pastime.

Generally speaking, the Anglo-Indian passengers are of a graver fashion on board ship than those from and to the Antipodes. Conversation in the saloon and smoking-room with us takes oftentimes an Imperial and administrative tone. A military group gathers about a general officer who bore part in the second Burmese War and has interesting personal experiences to give of Mandalay, Rangoon, King Theebaw, and the River Irrawaddy. Irrigation in India and the merits of the rival railway gauges absorb another knot of civil engineers. In a third corner some colonels and majors of native regiments discuss with energy the terrible heats of Suakin and the Nile, and deplore the alleged want of generosity with which the Sepoy has been treated in Egypt, returning as he does to Bombay with worn-out boots and khakee-suits to replace from his pay, and no rupees in his belt for wife and children. All agree that any policy would be better, any expenditure wiser, than to send these Indian volunteers home discontented, thereby discouraging the enlistment of good recruits, and diminishing the credit and honour of the Sircar. From another cool nook of our ever-speeding steamer, where Indian shikaris are collected, float fragments of animated chat about jungle and forest; talk of the man-eating tiger and of the desperately-charging bison; while the merits of the Express rifle and different forms of the blade of a hog-spear are being keenly discussed.

So our idle hours glide, in alternate fair and troubled weather—in long days, which begin at dawn with the deck-scrubbing, and nights of sleep rendered fitful by the beat of the screw and the hissing of the waves—until the Gulf of Tunis opens on the starboard bow, disclosing an archipelago of lofty islands, seated on these broad African waves. The Parramatta passes close to one of them, called Zambra, a bare and craggy mass, rising in sterile pinnacles from the deep indigo waters. It is apparently uninhabited, except by flocks of sea-birds, and, indeed, seems inaccessible. Others, larger and lower, show signs of human occupation. There are goats to be made out on the green slopes clad with macchie—the aromatic shrub which covers all these islets of the middle Mediterranean—and here and there a white-washed hut may be spied amid the black rocks. A finer air cannot blow on land or sea than these hermit shepherds and fisher folk have to breathe, warmed by the Libyan deserts from one quarter, and cooled by five hundred leagues of water on the other. At mid-day the important island of Pantellaria lies close under our beam and hardly more than a mile from the steamer's side. This is a convict station of the Italian Government, and certainly appears one of the pleasantest places for transportation which social sinners could inhabit. A tiny town nestles under the terraced red hills, with a little harbour in front, full of lateen-rigged fishing craft; and all the western and northern faces of the fair prison are dotted with gleaming stone cottages, where, no doubt, the "good-conduct" criminals reside, and cultivate their vines and olives. The Romans used Pantellaria for the same purpose, as a place of exile, and that Imperial adulteress, Messalina, is said to have expiated her offences on these same sea-girdled crags, amid solitudes of land and sea and sky, which, beautiful as they are, must have seemed hateful, after the splendour and luxuries of the sensual capital. How she must have pined in her fierce discontent—lassata, nondum satiata—for the wings of the fishing eagles which circle in the azure vault above the island, or plunge from time to time into the heaving sea, everywhere fringing it with a belt of surf! How her angry and guilty thoughts must have oftentimes flown back over these northern waves to her Roman palaces and her Roman lovers!

The Parramatta goes forward at half-speed all night, so that she may not make the somewhat difficult approach to the harbour of Malta in the dark. In the early morning Gozo shows close over her bows, and we soon have the entire length of the larger island unfolded to the eye. Malta is by no means merely the "garrison and a garden" which many suppose. There is plenty of elbow-room behind the stronghold and harbours of Valetta, roads where you may drive for seven or eight miles away from the capital; fields and large fruitful gardens and inland plains; villages and even little towns to be visited. Everybody knows the "streets of stairs," up which the visitor climbs to the Strada Reale from the "Nix Mangiare" landing-place, under the projecting windows of the fine old mansions built by the various Commanderies. Everybody also knows the green parterres of the Governor's residence, where the oranges hang in golden profusion, and the scarlet hibiscus, the snowy moon-flowers, the caper-tree, and the blood-red poinsettia show that winter is here unknown. Trees are very rare in the island; yet in the inner square of Government House there stands a Norfolk pine, planted by the Duke of Edinburgh while a midshipman, which in twenty-eight years has grown to goodly stature, and shelters innumerable sparrows of English breed, as unmistakable in their origin as is that of the fresh-cheeked Hampshire recruits who march through the gay streets. The armoury here contains some interesting relics of the Knights of St. John and of the tremendous sieges which the island has witnessed. The custodian shows you many hauberks, greaves, and breastplates—some richly inlaid with Damascene work of gold and silver—dinted, but not pierced, with Turkish bullets; primitive breech-loading guns, ferocious-looking spears and halberds; sabres delicately adorned with ivory and jewels, captured from the infidel, in the grim militant days when they fired the heads of slain Saracens from the fortress howitzers, and the besiegers answered by lashing their prisoners to lighted fireships. Here, too, is the solemn rescript signed by Charles of Spain—"Yo el Rey"—granting the island and its fortalices "for ever" to the Knights; and here is the ancient carriage of state, with its faded gilding and mouldering silk brocade, in which Napoleon proudly rode up the steep street, after the German Grand Master had surrendered the stronghold to the Emperor.

So formidable was Malta, in its natural strength, even at this time, that, when the first French commandant begged for special instructions upon the method of its defence, Buonaparte answered with scornful confidence, "Tell him to lock the fort gates and put the key in his pocket!" Since then millions of money have been spent in perfecting these bastions of masonry and living rock which frown upon the grand harbour and the quiet inlets under Valetta; nor is it possible to over-estimate the naval and military value of Malta to the Empire, as a station upon the "Queen's Highway" to the East and to the Colonies, and as a refitting port for the Mediterranean Fleet. Of that important division of the British navy there is nothing anchored in the harbour at present except the Thunderer and a corvette or two, but the quarantine cove is full of steamers from cholera-smitten Spain and Italy, forbidden to hold communication with the shore, and disconsolately flying the yellow flag.

A drive across the island to Civita Vecchia reveals the reason why it wears so arid an appearance from the sea. Innumerable stone walls are built, enclosing the little fields, and these, seen à fleur de l'eau, completely obscure from view the not unfertile patches of cabbage, potatoes, and garden ground which diversify Malta and still more Gozo. The high road, or Strada

Reale—which is crossed in the midst by a small railway—has well-built villas and peasants' dwellings along its whole course, and the islanders seem prosperous and contented: weaving, working in the fields, or carrying stores. Near to Civita Vecchia opens in the coast that rugged little inlet into which St. Paul's captain was "minded, if it were possible, to thrust his ship;" and a statue of the Apostle stands on the hill, erected, so they say, on the very spot where the snake fastened upon his hand. Hard by is a church consecrated to St. Paul, full of ill-wrought pictures delineating this and other incidents of the Apostle's career; nor does it seem doubtful, after learned investigations, that the Roman galley was indeed driven out of the Sicilian sea upon this island, and not, as used to be thought, upon the little islet of the same name in the Adriatic. One or two days of the wild weather experienced by the Parramatta might make the traveller wonder how those ancient navigators ventured to launch their small and unwieldy craft upon such wide waters, for even St. Paul's vessel must have been a mere "Margate Hoy." But the fact is they seldom sailed in winter, and in summer the sea itself is a roadstead: for it is quite true, as the Spaniards say, "There are four good harbours in the Mediterranean—May, June, July, and Port Mahon." From October to March they hauled their craft upon the beaches and only put forth for voyages in the fair weather, with a wind over the stern or broad on the beam; since fore-and-aft sailing was as unknown to them as the compass or steam.

Not far from the Church of St. Paul are to be seen some very curious excavations, of considerable extent, made in the limestone rock. They are styled "The Catacombs," and have undoubtedly been hollowed out with considerable pains, for the purposes of sepulture, by some race, which had Egyptian or Etruscan notions about preserving the dead body against the future revisitation of the spirit. Here are family vaults, opening on each side of long underground passages, where couches are cut in the white rock side by side for husband and wife, with a little special cleft to form the head-rest of each body, and, round about, smaller niches for the children of the household. There are scores of such cellar-like sepulchres in the hills near St. Paul's Bay, and the strange caverns burrow about the limestone in all directions, lighted and ventilated here and there by a shaft pierced in the roof. These dismal subterranean works may have been used as dwelling-houses in later times, as the Maltese tell you, but it is clear that they are originally the memorials of a primitive people, who brought hither from Semitic or Egyptian lands the customs of a cave-burying race.

All the way from Cape Spartel to the Impregnable Island, the Parramatta had steamed through a zone of rain-squalls alternating with sunshine, for this is the wet season on the African coast. Malta, which had lacked her usual allowance of moisture during October, was making it up during our stay in port by copious downpours, emphasized with thunderstorms; and the steamer sailed out of the busy harbour with wet decks.

But after reaching the Tripoli and Egyptian waters, where too often the Mediterranean can behave in a very unpleasant manner, the ship ran into one of the most golden and soft-skied spells that could be desired. From dawn to nightfall our great vessel sped under a sky of turquoise unbroken by any cloudlets, and over a deep so smooth that the light airs, here and there touching the surface, seemed like breaths breathed upon a polished mirror, disappearing as soon as they appeared. The "Bahr-el-Abiad," or White Sea, as the Arabs always call the Mediterranean, deserves its Syrian name on such a perfect day, for its face gleams all silver and pale blue, and nobody could believe it capable of soon rolling again in black and destructive billows. The light wind, coming from the south over the Libyan Desert, is now warm as new milk, and brings out the pretty muslin dresses of the ladies, and sets the punkahs swinging in the saloon. To-morrow in the afternoon we shall enter Port Said, and finish our prosperous run of some two thousand miles through the whole length of the "Middle Sea."

It is a sign of the vast expanses of this land-locked water that in all the long distances between the Straits and the Canal, with so prodigious a commerce coming and going, and upon the very main road of maritime trade, we have yet not sighted more than eight or ten sail of all sorts, beside the troopship Serapis and a French man-of-war. On such a voyage, so often made and over waters so familiar, the incidents are necessarily few. I have but three trivial ones to mention. In the Straits of Gibraltar a whale, with her calf, gambolled about the ship for some time, to the great diversion of the passengers. Early one morning, after a windy night, we passed a ship's boat, full to the gunwales with water, drifting drearily upon the waves, the token, it might be, of fruitless efforts to escape death, or, perhaps, more happily, merely washed from the davits of a labouring ship. And about eleven at night, when near the Cartagena coast, the clouds obscuring the stars, and the sea and sky being black as ink, the Parramatta's lights suddenly fell with a startling flash upon a Spanish schooner wallowing slowly over the seas in our direct path. There was time to give the wheel turn enough to carry the great steamer clear by about a biscuit's throw of the Spaniard, who, as we swept by, could be seen hastily getting out a flare-up light and heard shouting imprecations and adjurations. If the shadow of his sails had not caught our watchful third officer's eye the steamer would have run clean over the hapless Spaniard, and another crew would have been added to the populous graves of "the tideless, dolorous Midland sea." But nothing really untoward has thus far marked our prosperous course from the hour the Parramatta warped out of dock until the moment at which the low sandhills of Damietta have come close on our starboard-beam. The water has changed from indigo to emerald, and shoaled to thirty fathoms; and the light wavelets are alive with little flying-fish.

In regard to flying fish, I may here remark that I studied their habits with much attention in the Mediterranean and the Red Sea, the Indian Ocean and the Bay of Bengal. I must range myself, in the controversy about the method of their volitation, with those who believe that they can and do prolong their aerial course by continued efforts, and that it is not due merely to one initial impulse. The jerad-ul-bahr, the exocetus volitans, springs from the surface of smooth water with a vibration of the pectoral fins, so rapid that it makes a slight whirring noise as the fish leaves the sea. Then the wing-fins seem to be motionless as the little pink and green creature skims away, but if the surface be smooth you will see it freckled with a sharp ripple every time the fish touches, which will be at such distances as a "duck and drake" stone would graze; and it becomes plain that the fins are moving slightly but very swiftly in a direction to impel the fish by contact with the sea. When he can move closely along the top, striking the water at swift intervals thus, and holding his tail straight, the flying-fish will go as far as 250 yards, which would not be the case if this flight were unsupported by fresh impulses. Moreover, the wing-fins bear him up like the feathers of an arrow, as well as propel him like little paddles, and no bullet from a rifle keeps so low a trajectory. When waves are rolling, the exocetus does not often appear; and if he is suddenly frightened from his course or blown off from it, or alters it sharply, the little fish loses headway immediately, and drops quite abruptly and awkwardly into the sea.

I feel convinced, from hundreds of observations, and notwithstanding the absence of any considerable muscular apparatus about the pectoral fins to account for such strong and elaborate action, that the fish can keep his fins vibrating for quite half a minute at pace enough to drive him along the wave-tops almost as fast as a swallow, and that the initial effort, even before a wind, does not count for more than some twenty yards or so.

III.

THE CANAL AND THE RED SEA.

THE Parramatta steamed placidly into the mouth of M. de Lesseps' magnificent ditch in the afternoon of a perfect Mediterranean day. Much farther out to sea than at the line where the lighthouse and masts of Port Said could be discerned, the Nile had already shoaled the water to fifteen fathoms with the silt brought down from the equatorial hills of Africa, thereby changing its colour to a pale green. The mole which forms the western wall of the entrance to the canal is a fine rough piece of work, composed of tumbled blocks of concrete, each weighing twenty tons, and extending for more than two miles seaward. Behind it the wash of the Mediterranean is busily and usefully engaged day by day in piling up a beach of grey sand, which will help the masonry to preserve a clear and deep gateway to the port; but steam-dredgers are still obliged to work at the silt which drifts in round the lightship.

In the harbour a large collection of vessels will almost always be found lying. The first we pass in entering is a neat-looking Egyptian corvette named the Saker, or "Sabre," flying the flag of the Khedive;

her sailors on the fore-castle have spread their seggâdehs and are devoutly reciting the afternoon prayers. Astern of her is moored a melancholy craft—a ship of death and terror—the French troop-vessel Château-Yquem. At her fore-peak is seen flying the yellow flag of quarantine, and as we glide past her open ports and crowded decks the French soldiers and sailors on board her wear anything but the usual alert air of homeward-bound Gauls. They have brought cholera with them all the way from Tonkin, and it is given out that nearly 140 men have already died upon the voyage, while many are still sick or sickening. This unhappy steamer is forbidden intercourse with the shore or with other vessels, and some unfortunate Arabs who had gone on board to get work have been impounded there, and cluster despondingly on the fore-castle, doomed to a voyage they never desired or expected. Late last night, the agent tells us, the melancholy sound was heard of her ship carpenters nailing up coffins—for the dead cannot, of course, be cast over-board in the canal—and the ill-fated vessel, named so inappropriately after the bright and fragrant Bordeaux wine, will put to sea to-night, to everybody's great relief.

Next in order to the unlucky Frenchman rides the Almora, of the British India Line, and then we steer close alongside her Majesty's great white troopship the Crocodile, full of time-expired and invalid soldiers returning from Bombay and Suakin, with faces tanned by the sun, but for the most part healthy and cheery in appearance. The high, clean sides of the trooper, swarming with life ; her deck-houses and double awnings set fore and aft, and her strangely-shaped stem, make the Crocodile look like a vast Noah's Ark among the other steamers. The graceful Rosetta, of the Peninsular and Oriental fleet, rides close by, newly arrived through the canal from China. She was one of the ships taken up by the British Government as an armed cruiser in the days of the Penj-deh scare, and no handsomer craft could easily be seen. The Coromandel, another of this splendid navy of the Peninsular and Oriental, upon her first voyage, arrives from Calcutta while we lie at the buoys ; and the Assam is now working her way up the canal from Bombay. Other steamers and local craft are constantly arriving and departing, while launches, feluccas, dahabeeahs, nuggars, and little local boats, with fluttering awnings and flags, may be seen everywhere shooting about, amid wild Arab cries and violent gesticulations, giving the newly-created port a wonderful animation.

The town, upon its water face, is Levantine rather than Egyptian in aspect, and has sprung into existence like a bush of tamarisk from the sands, while it continues to grow in all directions. The climate is good, the situation commanding, and the time must surely arrive when Port Said will replace its present slight and unsightly buildings with streets and houses more worthy of the position, thereby becoming the modern Pelusium of Egypt. A few years ago the place was a den of thieves and assassins, nor could any one safely traverse its back streets and byways after dark. Incautious persons who were seen to win money at the roulette tables, or who showed too much of it in making their purchases, were often followed at night and stabbed in the back by the ruffians infesting the suburbs. Even now there is a quarter at the back of the town, where, if crime is not to be feared, vice is about as shameless and as rampant as in any part of the world. But things are greatly improved. Baker Pasha's gendarmes patrol the streets night and day, and there are no serious disturbances, except those due to the nocturnal yelling of the Egyptian and negro coal-heavers, who, by the light of blazing beacons, fill up the bunkers of the steamships which are for ever arriving and departing. That there still exist thieves, however, in Port Said was rather painfully proved to us by the fact that on the night of our stay in the port a new hemp hawser was carried off by marauders from the ship. It had been stretched as a warp from the Parramatta's stern to some bollard-heads on the eastern bank; and during the darkness a boat with Arabs or Greeks must have glided alongside, cut the cable close to the ship, coiled it silently into their stern sheets, cast the shore end loose, and disappeared with the plunder. The thieves would doubtless bury it for a while in the sand on the Canal-bank, until the hue and cry had subsided, and afterwards realise heavily upon their spoil at Damietta, or perhaps Alexandria. Honest folk may find plenty of work in Port Said with the perpetual coming and going of passengers and the ever-increasing commercial business of the town.

PORT SAID.

The interest of it to a visitor is soon exhausted. The streets are well laid out as regards proportion; on the bare sand, however, without any attempt at road-making, except where the stone carts and donkeys tread the middle of the way into hard ground. There are cafés, of the third-rate Continental sort, with ladies from third-class Smyrna and Naples music-halls, who nightly sing and act, dividing the attention of their polyglot customers with roulette tables, where the votary of Fortune stakes florins and two-franc pieces, arriving at the usual result of promptly and regularly enriching the proprietors. There is a small public garden, feebly nourishing some locust trees and plantains, for the soil is hereabouts all mere sea-sand. The fruit and fish markets are, nevertheless, well supplied, the former from Damietta; while the port swarms with large and small fish, which at night glide through the water like electric lamps, their forms perfectly visible in the luminous sea that flashes and curdles with milky light at every disturbance. By day the porpoises roll about the harbour, helping themselves to endless banquets of finny fry. The town is therefore well furnished with mullet, rock-fish, "Port Said salmon," and great ugly siluroids; but now that refrigerators have come in fashion steamers depend very little on fresh fish or meat. Eggs are cheap and good, though very small, for the Egyptian hen—although the natives paint her here and elsewhere with green, yellow, and crimson tints—seems incapable of any serious effort in the direction of omelettes.

The Arab quarter consists at present of booths and wooden huts, and the bazaars possess for experienced travellers little interest or picturesqueness. In one of them, however, we found a native café where two Ghawazi girls were languidly dancing before the usual audience of low-class Arab and negro connoisseurs. One, clad in scarlet, was a novice of no skill; the other—graceful and clever, with a handsome face of the old Egyptian type, worn hard and marked deep by a life of vice—was prettily dressed in wide trousers of purple and gold, a spangled jacket, and head-dress of coins and beads, with a jingling girdle of silver amulets. Asked if she could perform for us the “Balance Dance,” she consented to exhibit that well-known Egyptian pas for the modest consideration of two francs and a bottle of English beer. The cork of this contribution being drawn, a lighted candle was fixed in the neck of the bottle, which was then placed upon the crown of her black and glossy little head. A carpet was next spread upon the sand, and, extending her hands, armed with castanets, and singing in a high but not unpleasing voice to the accompaniment of a darabouka and rabab, she swayed her lithe body in slow rhythmical motions to the words of her song and the measured beat of the musicians. “I am black, but it is the sun of thy love which has scorched me! Send me some rain of help from thy pity. I am thirsting for thee.” The Ghawazi began with Arabic words of this tenor, keeping exact time to her strain with foot and hand and the tremors of her thrilling, slender frame; now slowly turning round, now softly advancing and receding, now clasping her hands across her bosom or pressing them to her forehead—but perpetually keeping the bottle and lighted candle in perfect equilibrium upon the top of her head. Suddenly she sank, with a change of musical accompaniment, to the ground, and—while not only maintaining the completest harmony of her movement, but even making this strange posture one of grace and charm—she contrived in some dexterous manner, without touching it, to shift the bottle from the top of her head to her forehead, and thus reclined on the mat, her extended fingers softly clapping the castanets, her light, girlish frame palpitating from crown to feet, always in the dreamy passionate measure of the ancient love-song. This was really an artistic piece of dancing, though the performer was only a common “almeh” from the Delta, but the dance is, no doubt, as old as the Pharaohs, and every step and gesture traditionally handed down.

The Canal sets forth from Port Said, in a breadth quickly to be diminished, between the vast marsh of Menzaleah and the dusty Pelusiac plain. On one side interminable sheets of stagnant water, broken by spits of mud, on which stand legions of flamingoes, storks, pelicans, and geese; on the other equally far-reaching levels of greyish-yellow sand, on the distant edge of which the mirage lifts the dunes and rocks into the sky, and draws a flickering white line of what seems like a lake or pool at their base. The illusion of this "false water" is at times astonishingly perfect.

The Arabs call it bahr-bi-la-moya, the "sea that is not water," and even the most experienced camel-drivers are sometimes deceived by it. Yet it is a curious fact that animals never make any mistake on the subject, and the pictures in verse or prose which tell how are false to natural history. The cattle judge proximity of water by smell and other signs, nor does the mirage ever cheat a camel or a donkey. It is most striking in the early morning when dew lies on the ground: then the desert bushes are magnified into trees, and their reflections sleep under them, precisely as if mirrored in distant water. In Kelat and the wildernesses of the Indus frontier the Belooch calls it Lum pari ab, the "Minstrel's white lake," from an old legend that a Lum or travelling minstrel, crossing the desert, saw the bright fresh water, as he thought, sparkling in the sun, with green trees and cool banks, and emptied out the muddy liquid from his leathern bottle that he might the more quickly speed to the pool; the end being that he perished of thirst. In other parts of India the optical illusion is also common, and is styled Chitram, "the picture."

"Panting cattle press to reach the dream,"

Between boundless fowl-haunted swamps and dreary barren flats the ship thus continued to thread her slow

M. M. M.

THE SUEZ CANAL.

course, guided by small painted buoys, placed at intervals of some four hundred yards. The great bulk of our steamer passing through the narrow channel pushes a bow wave upon the flat margins of the Canal, which meets, in receding, the stern-wash from the screw, the two together forming a formidable roller that surges back alongside the vessel and eats the light banks away in a decidedly menacing manner. The sooner M. de Lesseps increases the width of his canal the better, especially in the middle of the Red Sea portion, where the passage—commenced on too ambitious a scale—diminishes to a veritable ditch, so narrow that two vessels cannot pass each other. At night every steamer “ties up,” laying warps out to either bank. Thus we spent the dark hours of Thursday, November 12, proceeding next morning between high shores of drab-coloured sand, loosely bound by the roots of tamarisk-bushes, and the creeping colocynth with its pretty but nauseous little melon-like fruit, until Lake Timsah was reached—the “Crocodile Pool,” whereon the town of Ismailia is seated, in a patch of refreshing verdure. The Parramatta steams forward, however, anxious to get clear of the Canal before sunset, but is again and again obliged to “tie up” by reason of vessels coming northwards and having the “right of way.” We are, therefore, occupied two nights and days in traversing the famous “short cut,” the most picturesque part of which is certainly at the Bitter Lakes. Here a little inland sea, nine miles in width, is crossed—a light green, gaily dancing, but intensely saline water, bordered by yellow plains of sand, and on the far south by the purple walls of Gebel Attaka. The arid waste has little or no vegetation, even up to the foot of the hills, except scrappy grass, and the nebbuk bushes. These latter shine with a bright thorny leaf, but bear a horribly bitter fruit, said by the Arabs to be given to the damned in hell by the Angels of Judgment when they complain too loudly of hunger.

At the southern exit of the Lakes we are brought once more to a stand by seven steamers in Indian file worming their way up from Suez, and are obliged a second time to anchor for the night. Next morning an early start enables the Parramatta to emerge by the breakfast hour into the roadstead of Suez, which town has grown from a collection of mud hovels to a place full of buildings which look almost important from a distance. Here are docks and store sheds, moreover, and ships from all Eastern ports, grouping their masts and funnels against the vast dark rampart of Gebel Attaka. The Gulf of Suez widens down, in beautiful perspective of expanding sea and folded mountain ranges, between that Egyptian ridge and the Sinaitic masses upon the east. On the left the well-known Ayn Moosa, "the well of Moses," dots the dry Arabian plain with a pannus of green acacias and palms. Lower down, on the same side, are the "Baths of Pharaoh," and the beginning of those high and weather-eaten hills about Tor, which completely shut out the "Mountain of the Law" from the voyager's inquiring eye. The hopelessly barren peninsula of Sinai ends in the bold headland of Ras Muhammed, opposite to which the setting sun brings broadly out the peaks of Gebel-ez-Zayt, the Hill of Oil; now revindicating its ancient name by the discovery of petroleum springs in the range. Then we steam forth into the Red Sea, rolling hereabouts as blue as sapphire, the Parramatta running gaily along at fourteen knots an hour, in full chase of the Orient steamer Potosi, which started an hour or two before us from the buoys at Suez.

Our third Sunday on the waves falls in the Red Sea off the ancient port of Kossayr, on a splendid but burning-hot dawn. There are few religious functions, I think, more impressive than a service on the open waters in the saloon of such a vessel; and some of those amongst us who seldom go to church ashore are drawn to bear part in the simplicity and pathos of this maritime act of reverence. The table draped with the Union Jack; the hymnals all "coiled down" against the moment when the harmonium shall resound; the books of worship decorously laid out by the quartermaster for the captain's use; the captain himself, gallant, solemn, his hair "sable-silvered," his gold eye-glass rigged to tackle properly and with a fair course the psalms and prayers; the long rows of beautiful or gentle and high-bred feminine faces, of brave and dutiful English gentlemen bound on the service of the Queen, or the honourable toils of business abroad—all these assembled upon the bosom of the great deep for worship, combine into a noble picture of British gravity and veneration. Near to the illustrious General who restored our name and fame in Afghanistan by his wonderful march from Cabul to Candahar kneel veteran colonels with every one of them an honourable history, and young officers who will by and by make it; and when the captain has finished his supplication for the "safety of all those who sail in this ship," the harmonium, touched by skilful fingers, leads off a song of pious praise, and the sound of a hundred blended voices passes with the wind over the blue expanse upon which we are speeding. The little children, kneeling round their mothers; the dark-skinned ayahs in their gay saris, grouped outside the saloon-doors; the punkahs waving to and fro, the Indian boys at the window, in snow-white garments and scarlet turbans, dreamily working them; the beat of the tireless screw; the hiss of the sweeping seas; the rattle of cordage and chains, and the ship's bell striking the watches, furnish elements of grace, colour, and incident to our little floating church which deepen the solemn effect when the good captain's voice is heard praying for the peace and welfare of the Queen, and of that glorious British Empire, of which we are here a small moving, isolated fragment. No wild theorist has as yet proposed to democratise a ship. There are famous men in plenty on board the Parramatta, men with names known all over the civilised world, but the authority of Captain Anderson is disputed in nothing; what he says and does is law for all alike; we live under a benevolent but absolute monarchy, our accepted sovereign being the man who,

by forty years of experience, knows better than anybody else what is safe for the ship, and has, humanly speaking, the lives of all in his hands. The Caucus would have no chance of influence upon the deep sea, where people come face to face with the elemental powers, and with the eternal law that the wisest ought to command and the unwise ought gladly and gratefully to obey.

Midway between Suez and Aden we had true Red Sea weather—brilliant dawns, burning noons, blazing sunsets, and starry placid nights. This is the hottest zone of sea and land on the globe excepting the Persian Gulf and the coast of Senegambia. The Hedjaz Arabs themselves leave the oven-like shores of their country in summer, and hide, for coolness' sake, in the islands. The middle of this long and torrid water is clear to the passage of ships save for the deadly "Brothers" and the "Dædalus Shoal," both of which, however, are now lighted. The latter lying à fleur d'eau, in mid-channel, was a constant terror of navigation, and could not safely be passed at night-time. Along each coast stretches a belt of reef, where the fatal branched coral, white and red, breaks the sea so gradually that a ship is dashed upon it before she knows her danger. The Arab pilots will only steer into the sherms, or inlets of this coral-line belt, when the sun is behind them, so as to show instantly where the water changes colour, for there is no tell-tale surf, and currents whirl and suck treacherously near to each opening into the shelves. Dismal and grim are the names given to such rocky death-traps all the way from Akaba, which the Arab sailor never crosses without prayer, down to the "Gate of Affliction," that leads out into the Indian Ocean. Here and there the fringing islands have colonies of sun-baked, adventurous men, who catch the turtle, sharks, and seals frequenting the ledges, and export, in occasional buglas, oil, fins, and shell. The old mariners found emeralds in some of these furnace-like spots, and Mersa Dahab, the "Golden Port," in the Gulf of Suez—one of them—was King Solomon's Ezion Geber. Eve died and was buried—the Arabs say—at Jeddah, the port of Mecca, where her tomb, sixty feet long, is devoutly shown; and near it is Yembo, the harbour of Medina, the city where lie the bones of Mohammed, "upon whom be peace." Peace also be to all those brave gentlemen and gallant soldiers who sleep in the fiery sands of Suakin, opposite to the Prophet's home. As we steam, half-roasted even at this season, through the glowing air and over the boiling billows of the "Erythræan," we realise better than in England what our brave soldiers and sailors must have undergone on those disastrous uplands of Teb and Tamai. Bristling with hidden perils, lashed by wild winds, and obscured by sandstorms; haunted by enormous sharks in the water, by ferocious tribes upon the shores, and by jins and afreets in the air, it seems no wonder that this terrible yet beautiful sea is lined along both coasts with ancient Arabic names of ruin and lamentation. Every cape and reef and islet has no doubt witnessed some untold tragedy, and the bones of hadjis and merchants strew hereabouts a thousand nameless coral banks.

The Bahr-el-Ahmar, for Arabs also know it as the "Red Sea," is no doubt named from Edom, the "Ruddy Land" which borders it; but you do sometimes, in traversing it, pass over large patches of water stained to a crimson tint with the Oscillatoria rubescens and the Trichodesmium Erythræum which are filamentous algæ, like shreds of blood, and cover the surface far and near. The average depth is 500 fathoms, but goes over 1000, and the tide rises and falls about four feet. The rocks are mainly volcanic, and many of the islands send forth smoke and a glare by night. Those old navigators who first explored it, Scylax, the admiral of Darius, Eudoxus of Cyzicus and others, must have had an awful experience with their ancient craft under its fierce suns and fiery winds. From Alexander's time until the officers of the Bombay navy and Waghorn reopened the Sea, its waters remained a wilderness of solitude, with not a sail on their bright blue face, except where timid African and Arab boats crept up and down inside the shoals, or put across in the quiet intervals with infinite fear and tribulation. You see them now occasionally, the Katera Baye or coasting boat; the Sambuk with short cut-water, the Bugla with bluff bows, and the Dhow, or Dhowranjah, with huge clumsy stem and sloping stern. But the Canal has filled the Erythræan with large and small steamers coming and going independently of winds and waves, not only those of the Peninsular and Oriental, which must have left broad pathways of cinders on the coral bottom, nor of the other regular lines, but hordes of "ditchers" or "water-tramps," as the Canal traders are called, beside the vessels now regularly plying with "the faithful" at the season of pilgrimage to Mecca.

As for ourselves, this splendid vessel—an example of admirable discipline and perfect comfort—takes us through all the wonders and perils of the Bahr-el Ahmar at fourteen miles to the hour, and the three great sharks which have followed us from the Dædalus Shoal will get nothing for their cruise except the cook's refuse. It is so hot, however, that even the young ladies have almost ceased to flirt, and languidly fan themselves under double awnings and waving punkahs; while those human salamanders, the Seedee stokers, emerge from time to time, glistening with perspiration, from the Hades of the furnace-room, and lie, with nothing save a scanty cloth round their middle, cooling their black bodies in the wet refreshment of the scuppers. Early on Tuesday morning, Nov. 17, we spy the lighthouse on Perim, and emerge into the Gulf of Aden, glad to breathe the less relaxing airs of the Sea of Sinbad.

IV.

PERIM TO BOMBAY.

THE sea has extraordinary caprices! In the narrow waters of the Straits of Gibraltar, and again where the Red Sea contracts towards Bab-el-Mandeb, we had rolling billows which would have made a line-of-battle ship dance, and which set even the stately Parramatta in somewhat lively motion. Here on the Indian Ocean, which stretches without a break in its vast expanse from the Arabian Mountains and the sun-baked crags of the Hadramaut Coast to the Antarctic Circle, the sea has once again slumbered like an inland lake. There have been days and nights when the surface of this broad waste lay undisturbed by even a ripple, so that the splash of the flying-fish—startled from the deep by the sharp bows of our steamer, and skimming away right and left, like birds frightened up from a furrow by a ploughshare—became quite an event, upon that world of sleeping silver. Yet on these same waters, in the early part of the year, a cyclone was raging which caused the loss of the fine vessel Speke Hall, and overwhelmed, with every soul on board, a German corvette and a French warship. That, however, was during the first and worst of the monsoon ; we are traversing the Indian Ocean in almost the best season ; at the time when even the little dhows and buglas of the Arab and Persian ports put fearlessly forth to sea with cargoes of coffee, honey, dates, and horses ; and such little craft may be occasionally seen from our decks wallowing along with high lateen sails and turbaned steersmen. Their greatest peril lies in the dead calms, which render our large steamer's voyage so pleasant, for the heat here is at least fifteen degrees below that which was experienced in the middle of the Red Sea, and the little children and ladies on board no longer lie listlessly about, gasping for fresh air.

In long-continued calms the native craft sometimes run sadly short of water, and Captain Anderson related to us at tiffin to-day how, in this latitude, he was once brought to by a dhow's crew signalling piteously for water. The Arabs who rowed to the steamer's side could hardly pronounce the word "moya" with their parched lips, and when full goblets of water were handed to them, the poor fellows, says the captain, "drank like horses," as if their thirst could never be assuaged. The gratitude of the despairing people grew boundless when beaker after beaker of the precious fluid was passed down into the boat, and a big cask of it given them to take in tow to their dhow. In such ill-found and often helpless vessels Nearchus sailed his Periplus, and Sinbad made his seven voyages on this ocean ; indeed, even at the moment of writing there is a whale on our port beam basking upon the surface, almost big enough to give some warrant to the story of the Thousand and One Nights. Who does not remember how that "Ancient Mariner" of the East with his companions landed on what seemed an island in the deep, and only discovered that it was an immense fish when the fires lighted upon its back tickled the monster, and set him diving down five hundred fathoms? What, indeed, may not seem possible amid such an universe of waters? If we sailed far enough, we might perhaps see the great Roc flying over the evening waves to some unnamed islet where her prodigious egg lies a-hatching on shingle composed of dead men's bones mixed with sapphires and rubies. We might come upon that green and opulent valley of diamonds, where you fling raw legs of mutton into the ravine and find them afterwards carried up into the eagles' nests, stuck full of brilliants. Baghdad and Bassora are not very far away to our north-west; northwards lie Ormuz and the pearl grounds of the Persian Gulf; southward, beyond sight, but not at any great distance, gleam the Laccadives, "Lakh-dwipa," the "one hundred thousand islands" of the Indian Ocean; and underneath our keel, so some geologists believe, lurks the buried continent of "Lemuria." Nothing ought to appear too wonderful to happen on such waters, not even if we heard in the middle watch that mystic ærial voice of which Shelley sings:

"Never such a sound before

To the southern skies we bore:

A pilot asleep on the Indian Sea Leaped up from the deck in agony,
And cried aloud, 'Oh, woe is me !'
And died as mad as the wild waves be."

Perim, which we skirted on Wednesday morning the 18th, has put on quite an inhabited air during the last twenty years. It used to look as empty and barren as the neighbouring islets of the Dhalak Archipelago, except for one or two provisional structures which housed a sergeant's party. Now there exists a substantial lighthouse on the Arabian side and a group of solid edifices on the high ground of the island, where the garrison of eighty men and officers find shelter. The 'islandette' was called Diodorus by the ancients, and is named Mayoon by the Arabs. Albuquerque christened it Vera Cruz, on his voyage in 1513 A.D., and built a cross on its summit. Moreover, we ourselves occupied it once in 1799 before that little stroke of sharp practice which gave us renewed possession in 1857. Perim, as a place d'armes, closes the "Gate of Affliction" only in the sense of affording a spot which could be made the nucleus of a strong station for armed cruisers, because on the African side of the islet, as is well known, there stretches a passage of deep water eight miles wide, which is always open, and cannot possibly be denied to an enemy except by superior naval force present on the spot. Our little appanage would, of course, be reinforced for such a purpose from Aden, of which most important station it is an annexe, distant about eighty miles.

There has been no element of politics hitherto in these slight sea-letters, but the Parramatta carries on board more than one authority of great eminence upon the naval and military interests of the Empire, and it is right that public attention should be directed to views taken by such upon the extremely momentous questions connected with this portion of the "Queen's Highway" to India. Those responsible for the protection of that highway, and of the valuable stations which guard it, ought without delay to make up their minds as to the policy to be adopted in regard of French, Italian, and German annexations in the vicinity of Aden. All three Powers are hovering about these waters, and their flags are seen somewhat too often and too ubiquitously not to compare disadvantageously for us with the paucity of English ships of war, and the passiveness of our conduct. The Italians are at Zeila and Berbera, as well as Massowa; the French are buying or seizing islands and ports of the Red Sea and Somauli littoral; the Germans are demanding cessions from the Sultan of Zanzibar. It is absolutely necessary that England should make her mind up about the regions or stations at the further end of the Red Sea, which are vital to the supply and safety of Aden and Perim; and that having so resolved, she should announce and execute her resolution with the greatest promptitude. There is really no time to lose. The conditions of these flying notes of travel forbid me to offer any full details and explanations upon the subject; but the British public may be positively assured that the Empire has come of late nearer to graver perils in connection with Egypt and India, as regards foreign ambition and intrigues, than has been openly mentioned; and that one element of future safety, imperiously demanded by the secret designs of those who are jealous of British supremacy, is to attend more closely and courageously to the exigencies of our Empire at the southern exit of the Red Sea. It is much to be wished that our gallant fellow-subjects and comrades, the Australians, who helped the mother-country so gladly in the Soudan, would take up this matter. If they could see their way to establishing a settlement or maritime station on the African mainland there are plenty of localities where they might find a fertile background, and a convenient harbour for their cruisers; moreover, it is the opinion of very distinguished and competent authorities that such a step on the part of Australia, while it would give expansion and political dignity to the Colony, would be of inestimable help to the Empire at large. "Australian papers please copy!"

A run from breakfast-time, at nine a.m., until four in the afternoon, under the barren hills of Ras Arâr, brought our good ship to "Steamer Point" and into the harbour of Aden. This "Cinder-heap" looks always, what it is by nature, the driest, most sterile, most savagely forbidding spot on which man ever settled. But here also, buildings, public and private, have increased remarkably during the past twenty years, and the sea-face of her Majesty's Arabian fortalice wears at present quite a populous appearance. Aden—the “Eden” of Ezekiel xxvii. 23, and the Eudaimon of the “Periplus”—was known to the Romans, who called it Portus Romanicus, and there exists, contrary to belief, a constant supply of good water on the northern side of the peninsula. When we passed inside Steamer Point our ship was, of course, soon surrounded by a crowd of Somauli Arabs in their little “dug-out” canoes, naked except for a white loin-cloth, and clamorously begging that coins might be thrown into the water for them. As soon as a four or eight anna piece was flung into the sea, three or four eager little glistening savages hurled themselves after it, plunging fathoms down in the pale green water, where they gradually vanished from sight, leaving canoes, paddles, and the world above to take care of themselves. After quite a long interval their woolly pates—reddened, as is the fashion, with lime and henna leaves—emerge one after the other, and somebody has the coin between his shining teeth. The bonitos, leaping up and down in the harbour, could not seem more thoroughly in their element than these fearless, symmetrical, brown-skinned barbarians, the most wonderful swimmers in the world, excepting, perhaps, the South Sea Islanders. As there were spotted sharks about one of the Somaulis was asked whether he did not feel afraid of them, but answered, grinning from ear to ear, “Shark not like eat Somauli boy.” That was unnecessarily self-depreciative. The sharks, if hungry, would be glad enough to nip an arm or a leg from these lively young Africans, and, indeed, I talked with one who had thus lost a limb ; but the Somaulis can see under the water almost as well as out of it, and take particular care to have the locality clear of their ferocious enemies when they dive.

Those claiming the pleasure of personal acquaintance with the Resident of Aden, General Hogg, formed a party invited to dine at the Residency. An excellent opportunity was thus afforded of inspecting the town and cantonment. We were rowed from the Parramatta's ladder to the bunder by the stalwart Arab crew of the Resident's launch, neatly attired in white shirts and red turbans. A French man-of-war and an Italian corvette lay in port, with any number of dhows, buglas, and fishing-boats, but no British pennant was seen floating there. On shore a squadron of the Aden Horse—a smart body of well-mounted men—with a party of the 40th Infantry Regiment, were observed moving down to salute our distinguished shipmate the Commander-in-Chief of India. Carriages were also waiting for Sir Frederick Roberts and the rest of the guests of General Hogg, and, mounting into these, some of us started for a thorough inspection of the extraordinary settlement. All around, above, about, is hard, barren, arid, volcanic rock ; calcined, contorted, ejected from ancient earth furnaces, and everywhere exhibiting the dry, drear colours of extreme heat—brick red, sulphurous yellow, Tartarean black. A faint green tint here and there in the clefts of the sterile hills, where infrequent rain has trickled and dust has lodged, manifests the presence of sparse thorn-bushes and of the Aden lily, a pretty white-flowering bulb, which is well-nigh the only growing thing redeeming the utter desolation of the landscape. The eye turns with relief from those gaunt burnt mountains, shutting off the sky, to the gay and motley population thronging the roads, returning at sundown from the day's labour. In the throng are lively, chattering Somaulis, brown-bodied and red-headed, many among them models of savage grace and symmetry; white-coated English soldiers; Arabs of the mainland on fast-trotting camels; ringletted Jews—a colony of whom live here precariously on the trade in ostrich feathers—negroes from Zanzibar; Hindus, Turks, Egyptians, and Europeans. The road, which looks as if made of clinkers, slag, and ashes (scientifically it is “pisolitic paperino, cemented together by glassy, crystallised gypsum”), skirts the great coalyards which make Aden so precious—where we see some tame gazelles playing among the heaps of Wallsend—and then mounts by a zigzag into a marvellous cutting in the hot rocks, which presently develops into a deep ravine, guarded by a gate of masonry, with ditch, drawbridge, and heavy mounted guns. Passing through this one traverses what is evidently the lip of an extinct crater, and enters the basin of the ancient fires.

There, in the hollow of the treeless, frowning mountain called Gebel-Shumsam, lies the little town proper of Aden, or Aidenn, “the Paradise;” surely so called in antique irony, for Dante might have derived from its position and surroundings new conceptions of a circle in the Infernal Regions. The place itself is animated enough, with its swarms of light-hearted people, its strings of camels, donkeys, and family parties trudging home, and the beating of Arab drums and tambourines at the lighted cafés. All around it, however, rise these seared and savage rocks, reflecting the sun's rays by day, and radiating a heavy heat under the moonlight, without one blade of grass or leaf of foliage to relieve the weird scene. If there were townships in Hades this is assuredly the aspect which such infernal boroughs would wear. Yet we were assured by residents here that you grow quite attached to Aden after a stay of one or two years. It has climatic advantages even—so they declare—in the steadiness of the temperature and the pure dry atmosphere; but it enervates Europeans very palpably, and after six in the morning, by which time all parade and military work is done, the day, they all confess, is one long and slow siesta, until the evening star, rising over Lahedj, brings a little coolness to the brazen sky.

From the town of Aden we drove onward to the farther lip of the black volcanic crater in which it sits seething, and so reached the famous tanks. They lie, three in number, under a deep ravine of the mountain, where it opens towards the mainland; and are evidently not so much excavated works as hollows under the ridge, "bunded up" to catch the rainfall, and afterwards lined and faced with blocks of lava, and "chunamed." The great middle pool was full of good-looking liquid, said to be equal to eight months' supply; but the garrison is not permitted to drink this, being furnished instead with condensed water. A Parsee hires the tanks from Government, and retails the valuable contents at about the price of beer to the native population and also to the Arabs of the near interior, who are now fairly friendly, at least for some thirty miles beyond the outer gates. The proximity of the waters permits some plants, and even trees, to be grown hereabouts, of which the Hindu malli is enormously proud. There is even a temple in the vicinity, sacred to a Hindu god; so "Luximan" was quite happy and felt himself "at home."

To pass from this wild spot, and from the town bosomed in the burnt-out volcano, through long, dark tunnels cut under the hills, and by black dusty roads, to the bright, well-lighted Residency, was a striking and pleasing contrast. The Governor's House is of the type of the Indian bungalow—a large, commodious, but perfectly plain building, surrounded by latticed verandahs. At the porch the kindly, courteous General, surrounded by his staff, was receiving his flying guests; and after Sir Frederick Roberts had briefly inspected the bodyguard, and had been heartily cheered by some of his old soldiers, we all sat down to a brilliant improvised banquet—a party of fifty or more. If anything could have reconciled such birds of passage to a longer stay in Aden it would have been the charming society enjoyed under the Resident's hospitable roof; but our time was soon up, and, towed out to the Parramatta by the steam-launch, accompanied by some of the Aden officers, we once again mounted to the populous deck of the steamer, and the renewed throb of the engines soon carried us far down the Gulf of Yemen.

We have now been four days upon the Indian Ocean, and expect to drop anchor in Bombay Harbour on Tuesday next, the 24th of November, about noon. Since leaving Aden the days have all proved cloudless, the nights delightful, the sea either smooth or swelling gently under the breath of light head winds. "Without hasting, without resting," the Parramatta easily accomplishes about 320 miles in each twenty-four hours, and could do a great deal better. It would be ungrateful in the last degree not to speak in terms of warm praise of the ship, her officers, and the general management of the voyage. None, indeed, but the most exacting could find anything to complain of, though we are so large a party of passengers, and the voyage is one of twenty-seven days from the London Docks to Bombay. Our table is almost too bountifully provided; nothing is neglected for the ventilation and good management of the vessel, and all its daily and nightly work has been performed with a quiet discipline and precision which could not be surpassed. The country has reason to be proud of such a Company as the Peninsular and Oriental, which keeps in constant and perfect service this floating bridge of regular and well-ordered communication to its Eastern Empire. And the Company may be proud of such a ship as that in which we sail ; for a finer vessel never took the sea, nor one—as all on board agree—better commanded and officered. It used to be said in old days that no Indian voyage came to a close without a marriage and a duel. As regards the latter there has been no quarrel or contretemps of the slightest sort among us ; yet for the other contingency it is not easy for a quiet but observant person to answer so positively. There have been prolonged moonlight conversations and late continued promenades on the deck under the southern stars noticeable even by the careless eye in more than one quarter, which forbid any rash statement on my part that the old saying may not prove true as regards the first and most serious of the two dangers attending the passage to India.

V.

NEW BOMBAY.

THE transformation effected in this great and populous capital of Western India during the past twenty years does not very plainly manifest itself until the traveller has landed. From the new lighthouse at Colaba Point, Bombay looks what it always was, a handsome city seated on two bays, of which one is richly diversified by islands, rising, green and picturesque, from the quiet water, and the other has for its background the crescent of the Esplanade and the bungalow-dotted heights of Malabar Hill. He who has been long absent from India and returns here to visit her, sees strange and beautiful buildings towering above the well-remembered yellow and white houses, but misses the old line of ramparts, and the wide expanse of the Maidan behind Back Bay which we used to call "Aceldama, the place to bury strangers in." And the first drive which he takes from the Apollo Bunder—now styled the Wellington Pier—reveals a series of really splendid edifices, which have completely altered the previous aspect of Bombay. Close to the landing-place the pretty façade of the Yacht Club—one of the latest additions to the city—is the first to attract attention, designed in a pleasing mixture of Swiss and Hindu styles. In the cool corridors and chambers of that waterside resort we found a kindly welcome to the Indian shores, and afterwards, on our way to a temporary home, passed, with admiring eyes, the Secretariat, the University, the Courts of Justice, the magnificent new railway station, the Town Hall, and the General Post Office, all very remarkable structures, conceived for the most part with a happy inspiration, which blends the Gothic and the Indian schools of architecture. It is impossible here to describe the features of these very splendid edifices in detail, or the extraordinary changes which have rendered the Bombay of to-day hardly recognisable to one who knew the place in the time of the Mutiny and in those years which followed it. Augustus said of Rome, "I found it mud; I leave it marble," and the visitor to India who traverses the Fort and the Esplanade-road after so long an absence as mine might justly exclaim, "I left Bombay a town of warehouses and offices; I find her a city of parks and palaces."

Even the main native streets of business and traffic are considerably developed and improved, with almost more colour and animation than of old. A tide of seething Asiatic humanity ebbs and flows up, and down the Bhendi bazaar, and through the chief mercantile thoroughfares. Nowhere could be seen a play of livelier hues, a busier and brighter city life! Beside the endless crowds of Hindu, Gujerati, and Mahratta people coming and going—some in gay dresses, but most with next to none at all—between the rows of grotesquely painted houses and temples, there are to be studied here specimens of every race and nation of the East. Arabs from Muscat, Persians from the Gulf, Afghans from the Northern frontier, black shaggy Biluchis, negroes of Zanzibar, islanders from the Maldives and Laccadives, Malagashes, Malays, and Chinese throng and jostle with Parsees in their sloping hats, with Jews, Lascars, fishermen, Rajpoots, Fakirs, Europeans, Sepoys, and Sahibs. Innumerable carts, drawn by patient, sleepy-eyed oxen, thread their creaking way amid tram-cars, buggies, victorias, palanquins, and handsome English carriages. Familiar to me, but absolutely bewildering to my two companions, under the fierce, scorching, blinding sunlight of midday, is this play of keen colours, and this tide of ceaseless clamorous existence. But the background of Hindu fashions and manners remains unchanged and unchangeable. Still, as ever, the motley population lives its accustomed life in the public gaze, doing a thousand things in the roadway, in the gutter, or in the little open shop, which the European performs inside his closed abode. The unclad merchant posts up his account of pice and annas with a reed upon long rolls of paper under the eyes of all the world. The barber shaves his customer, and sets right his ears, nostrils, and fingers, on the side-walk. The shampooer cracks the joints and grinds the muscles of his clients wherever they happen to meet together. The Guru drones out his Sanskrit shlokas to the little class of brown-eyed Brahman boys ; the bansula-player pipes ; the sitar-singer twangs his wires ; worshippers stand with clasped palms before the images of Rama and Parvati, or deck the Lingam with votive flowers ; the beggars squat in the sun, rocking themselves to and fro to the monotonous cry of " Dhurruum ; " the bheesties go about with water-skins sprinkling the dust ; the bhanga-coolies trot with balanced bamboos ; the slim, bare-limbed Indian girls glide along with baskets full of chupatties or " bratties " of cow-dung on their heads, and with small naked babies astride upon their hips. Everywhere, behind and amid the vast commercial bustle of modern Bombay, abides ancient, placid, conservative India, with her immutable customs and deeply-rooted popular habits derived unbroken from immemorial days. And overhead, in every open space, or vista of quaint roof-tops, and avenues of red, blue, or saffron-hued houses, the feathered crowns of the date trees wave, the sacred fig swings its aerial roots and shelters the squirrel and the parrot, while the air is peopled with hordes of ubiquitous, clamorous grey-necked crows, and full of the " Kites of Govinda," wheeling and screaming under a cloudless canopy of sunlight. The abundance of animal life even in the suburbs of this great capital appears once more wonderful, albeit so well known and remembered of old. You cannot drop a morsel of bread or fruit but forty keen-beaked, sleek, desperately audacious crows crowd to snatch at the spoil ; and in the tamarind tree which overhangs our verandah may at this moment be counted more than a hundred red-throated parroquets, chattering and darting, like live fruit, among the dark-green branches. India does not change !

One cannot be a day in this land without observing how the ancient worship of the cow still holds the minds of the Hindoos. Those baskets of "bratties" are the established fuel of the country, which everywhere burns the bois de vache. The Banjaras are the only sect in British India which allow the cow to labour, and good Brahmans will feed a cow before they take their own breakfast, exclaiming, " Daughter of Surahbi, formed of five elements, auspicious, pure, and holy, sprung from the sun, accept this food from me. Salutation and peace ! " Everything which comes from the cow is sacred and purifying,—the droppings are plastered with water over the floors and verandahs of all native houses, and upon the cooking-places; the ashes of the same commodity are used, with colouring powders, to mark the foreheads, necks, and arms of the pious, and no punctilious Hindu would pass by a cow in the act of staling without catching the hallowed stream in his palm to bedew his forehead and breast. I have observed this morning my hamal reverently touch the compound cow as she passed him, when nobody was looking, and raise his hand to his mouth. He doubtless muttered the mantra, " Hail, O cow ! mother of the Rudra, daughter of the Vasu, sister of the Aditya, thou who art the source of ambrosia ! " India does not change !

Yet, a visit yesterday at the house of a well-known Hindu gentleman revealed that certain social alterations are silently operating at this Indian metropolis. Sir Munguldass Nathabhai, K.C.S.I., is of course a remarkably advanced and enlightened Hindu, renowned for his freedom from prejudices; but twenty years ago even this courteous and kindly personage could not have received me to the intimate hospitality of his mansion as he did. Meeting us at the door of his mansion, albeit in feeble health, he led the ladies of our party up his staircase to the drawing-room, where they were at once joined by the wife and daughters of the Hindu knight. These amiable native ladies could talk English perfectly, chatted on social topics, compared tastes in dress and tints, and in all respects observed our own usages of intercourse except in the graceful local addition that at the close of our visit they presented to their English friends deliciously fragrant bouquets of roses and jasmine, and offered the aromatic pan supâri and the rose water. Later on in the same day we again met the daughters and sons of Sir Munguldass at a "musical afternoon" given in a large house on Malabar Hill by a Parsee gentleman, Mr. Kâbraji. Here there were assembled in a really magnificent pillared hall, paved with white and blue marble, some eighty or a hundred of the leading members of Parsee, Hindoo, and Mohammedan society, including at least forty native ladies. Sir Frederick Roberts, Mr. Ilbert, Sir William Wedderburn, Mr. Justice Birdwood, and a number of English residents, mingled with the large native party on perfectly easy and equal grounds, but no London drawing-room could have presented a scene so bright in colour and character. The Parsee and Hindoo ladies—many of them personally most charming in appearance, and all gentle and graceful in demeanour—wore lovely dresses of every conceivable hue, rose colour, amber, purple, silver, gold, azure, white, green, and crimson. A Guzerati girl in red and gold sang the “Last Rose of Summer” with notable skill to the piano played by her sister, and then a ring of Parsee maidens, in flowing silk robes and dark glossy tresses, chanted a “song-circle,” softly singing in chorus, and beating time with their hands, while they moved round and round in a rhythmical ring of singular grace. The music ended with “God Save the Queen,” quite accurately sung by a number of these Indian maidens in native words; and after refreshments had been handed round, chaplets of flowers and little balls of rosebuds and the fragrant champa buds were distributed, and the well-pleased company separated by the light of innumerable oil lamps set among the shrubs and trees of the compound. If it were possible to depict the golden background of the Indian sky, and the sleeping surface of the Indian Ocean, which made the setting of this fair and friendly gathering—until the quick twilight suddenly closed upon us—some better artistic idea might be derived of the pleasant and novel afternoon thus spent. For assuredly such a gathering is a great and signal token of the increasing friendship arising between the races; nor could anything be calculated more to impress and gratify a fresh observer coming back, after many bygone years, to modern Bombay. One point was particularly noticeable to those accustomed to mark signs of fresh ideas in the native mind. It is incumbent on Parsee ladies to wear a rather ugly white band drawn tightly over the crown and brows, and this remnant of early times has resisted even the new taste for silk stockings, satin shoes, and European ornaments. But the pretty Zoroastrians, who possess the finest and glossiest black tresses in the world, object nowadays to conceal entirely this great charm, and so the white head-band is pushed farther and farther back, until it threatens to disappear altogether under the silk sari of violet or rose, sea-green, or sapphire, drawn so coquettishly over the head. Every Parsee, man and woman alike, must put on the Sadaro, or sacred shirt of cotton gauze, and the Kusti, or thin woollen cord of seventy-two threads representing the chapters of the Izashne, with two tails of twelve knots denoting the months of the year.

The new municipal institutions of Bombay are also very notable. In that collection of handsome and spacious halls called the "Crawford Market," fish, flesh, vegetables, flowers, fruit, and general commodities are vended in separate buildings, all kept in admirable order and cleanliness, and all opening upon green and shady gardens. The Hindu or European housewife finds printed lists affixed at the gates giving the day's prices. At a glance she can see what she must pay in the fish-markets for pomfret, pommelo, surmaye, jiptee, palah, bouie, shoall, bheng, and all the finny varieties brought in by the quaint fishing craft of the harbour. The quotations are given for cocoa-nuts, plantains, pomegranates, and limes—for meat, poultry, and green stuff; and shoals of bright-eyed naked Hindu boys attend each customer, with basket on head, eager to carry their purchases. Great as the morning heat was when we strolled through the crowded thoroughfares of this fine market, everything seemed fresh and clean, and even the Mohammedan butchers' stalls were as neatly kept as so many boudoirs. In the side-walks of the place Persians with white bushy-tailed cats for sale, bird-catchers with quails, floricans, and snipe, jungle people with monkeys and wild animals, pitch their little camps; and on all sides there seemed evidence of plentiful supplies and general well-doing. In fact, the population of Bombay, to judge from the streets and marts, are well employed, well fed, and contented, with few beggars about and perfect public order. Here and there, under the walls of a temple or bridge, will be seen rows of professional mendicants, exhibiting their deformed limbs or personal ailments as a means of livelihood; and strings of blind people, led in a long queue by a sharp-sighted lad, go about in the morning from shop to shop, asking for the pice, or handful of grain, which is seldom refused by the charitable native. But there seems little general pauperism in the busy ways, and its death-rate at the present moment would be considered good even for a European city.

Everybody who comes to Bombay pays a visit to the island of Elephanta, to inspect the cave cut in the rock, which is at the same time one of the first and one of the most striking sights in the country. We were invited by Mr. and Mrs. Gratton Geary to join a large breakfast-party which was to cross to Elephanta by a steam-launch on a visit to the island and the caves. The run of six miles across the shining waters of the harbour was quickly accomplished, and before eight o'clock we were picking our way over the stepping-stones which lead to the shore of the verdant and hilly islet. Its steep acclivities, divided by a cleft in which the caverns lurk, are clothed with a thick covering of Karunda bushes, wild indigo, and palms, amid which countless sulphur-coloured and purple butterflies flutter. A pious worshipper of Shiva—to which god the spot is especially sacred—has constructed a wide and well-built flight of stone stairs, by which the visitor now ascends the slope much more conveniently than of old. Little brown-skinned boys, resident in the place, beset you with bunches of jungle-blossoms or collections of green and diamond beetles, and those odd gilded wood-lice with transparent horny cases which while alive are the most beautiful creatures imaginable, but fade into hideous objects when dead. A two-anna piece purchases the whole collection, and makes the small naturalists vociferously happy.

PILLAR IN ELEPHANTA CAVE.

In ascending the steps from the mangrove swamps at the foot of the hill, the loveliest prospect opens of the harbour, with Karanja, Trombay, and the other islands studding its surface. But Elephanta, although so fair, has ever been pestilential with malaria, and haunted with numberless serpents. The sergeant in charge of the place, who meets us at the top, is yellow and quivering with fever, and mentions that he has himself killed one hundred and fifty-eight reptiles—cobras, carpet snakes, and rock snakes—since May last, when he came upon his post. He encounters them chiefly basking in the sun upon the stone stairs leading to the excavations, and, although unpleasant inhabitants, it is quite in harmony with the genius of the spot that an island sacred to Shiva the Destroyer should be peopled with the hooded snake, which was always the emblem of his awful power. In one corner of the gloomy but marvellous caverns—where a heap of broken stones lay under an image of this dread deity, and the overhanging rock, delicately sculptured with friezes of elephants, attendants, and fluted capitals, cast heavy shadows upon the hanging creepers and datura bushes—a cobra glided into the crevices just as we approached. It was the one presence needed to complete the sombre melancholy of this deserted fane, cut so laboriously out of the solid mountains, and tenanted by these vast carved effigies of antique Hindu gods. The cave-temples of Elephanta have, however, been too frequently described to render a repetition of their contents permissible here. Dr. Burgess, in an admirable treatise published by the Bombay Government in 1871, well-nigh exhausted the whole subject from the archæological point of view. Yet there is one gigantic statue, sculptured from the black hill-side, called the “Ardhanarishwâra,” which must always astonish and impress the visitor, even on repeated inspection. The name signifies “The Lord who is both male and female,” and it stands forth from the dark matrix of the crag on the right-hand side of the “Threefold Face,” or “Tri-Murti,” which is the chief image in the shadowy cavern. This statue, of colossal size, is nevertheless very delicately cut, and the limbs and features possess an almost tender beauty. But the right half of the deity from head to foot is male, and the left moiety female. On one side of the figure are the knotted hair, the breast, the limbs of a god-like man; on the other the smooth and braided tresses, the swelling bosom, the rounded contour of a goddess. Such incongruous elements are blended by a daring art into a whole which, in the subdued light of the vast cave, looks harmonious, majestic, and even natural. The Upanishad named Swêtaswatara has a passage which says, "He is the man and woman, youth and maid;" and this strange effigy, no doubt, represents Brahma so conceived of as uniting all forms and both sexes.

It was odd to pass from the cool dark air of the cavern-temple, and from the profound thoughts suggested by such ancient art, to the breakfast table spread outside in the broad daylight under the shade of a large tamarind tree and of cocoa-palms, some of which had lost their leafy crowns in the past monsoon. Laughter and gay conversation, with champagne-cup, soon dissipated for most of those present all thought of the antique lessons carved on the living rock of the mysterious temple; and the island, girdled by glad waves and lines of distant mountain lying golden and red in the sunshine, seemed as if made for happy people to sojourn safely in. Yet every rock and thicket held those creeping venomous horrors, the symbols of Shiva's destructiveness; and fever brooded like a spirit of evil in the hollows and green mangrove flats; while behind the waving trails of bloom and foliage veiling the mouth of that awful cave, stared forth for ever from the black wall Shiva himself, with his grim omnipotent consorts, holding the eternal secrets of life and death.

THE ARDHANARISHWĀRA, ELEPHANTA CAVES.

We did not quite escape the maleficent powers of the island. Our charming hostess, while botanising, plucked inadvertently a pod of the pretty but horribly stinging kiwach, which we call "cowhage," or "cow-itch." The microscopic hairs upon the pod are so many poisonous daggers, and these sadly blistered and inflamed her hand and wrist, giving as much pain as though they had been scalded. Warm water relieved the smart, which presently passed away; but she will never carelessly touch again those beaded woolly seed-cases which look so graceful and burn so cruelly. In bad old days this Macuna pruriens was employed to poison wells.

We visited the same day a large school for Parsee girls, where some one hundred and fifty of the Zoroastrian maidens, of all sizes and ages, were learning wisdom of the modern sort, the little ones with black tresses flowing from beneath embroidered caps, the older girls in the sari, the pretty bright choli, and the skirt. They sang "Home, sweet home," to Guzerati words, and proudly exhibited their achievements in sewing, knitting, and crochet-work. Wherever you encounter Parsees in India you will find intelligence, enlightenment, and energy; it is only a pity that this admirable people are not more numerous. As we drove in the evening to dine on Malabar Hill, a marvellous display of shooting stars attracted attention. The unclouded sky was perpetually crossed by flights of meteors, radiating apparently from the zenith, and sometimes of extraordinary brilliancy. We must have seen many hundreds fall within three quarters of an hour. The date (for the information of astronomers) was November 27.

Misenbach

BOMBAY, FROM MALABAR HILL.

VI.

THE GHAUTS AND POONA.

THAT section of the Great Indian Peninsular Railway which runs from Bombay to the capital of the Mahratta country may compare in interest with any hundred miles of iron road in the world. Leaving Byculla Station the traveller threads the thoroughly "Hindu" suburbs of Parel, Dadur, and Chinchpoogly, his train flying through groves of date and cocoa palms, amid temples, mosques, synagogues, and churches; dyeing-grounds spread with acres of new-dipped brilliant silks and calicoes; by burning-ghauts and burying-places; by mills, stone-yards, and fish-drying sheds, through herds of wandering brown sheep and grey goats, droves of buffaloes and kine, and great throngs of busy people; all these combining into a continuous picture. Crossing an inlet of the sea at Sion Causeway, the line next coasts the island of Salsette amidst the most characteristic Oriental scenery, and arrives, by many a low-roofed village and tangled patch of jungle, at Tanna. Here the outlying spurs of the Syhadri Mountains—steep eminences, coloured red and black, and capped with extraordinary square rocks, like walled fortresses, or domes and pinnacles constantly resembling temples—shut in the sea-flat upon which the town stands; and we are advanced to a spot where, with natural beauty on all sides, the thickets on the hills shelter tigers and panthers, and the water swarms with alligators. Of late years these wild creatures have been largely evicted by sea and land, and even the pretty striped palm squirrel—whose back is marked with Parvati's fingers—and the green parroquets with rosy neck-rings, are becoming rare in places which once abounded with them.

Tanna is interesting historically. Portuguese, Mahrattas, and British have fought stoutly for these rich fields and tree-clad acclivities, and in the old fort here was once confined Trimbukji, the wily minister of Baji Rao, last of the Peishwas or Deccan kings. That famous chief was under guard in Tanna, watched by a strong force of European soldiers; but a Deccanee groom, pretending to exercise a horse beneath the prison walls, managed, while singing a Mahratta song, to convey to Trimbukji by the words of his loudly chanted ballad all the information necessary to enable the prisoner to know where and when the fleet horses would be waiting which the same night carried him away. Near at hand, moreover, are the Caves of Kanheri, unquestionably Buddhist, for in them have been found classical inscriptions enshrining the doctrines of Gautama, and it is even believed that the sacred relic at Kandy—the tooth of the Buddha—was first treasured up in a Daghoba of the Kanheri hill. The island of Salsette is very rich in such memorials of

“the Light of Asia.” Next, crossing to the mainland, the railway proceeds along the banks of a creek—lined with palm-groves, mangoes, and fig-trees, and peopled with snowy egrets and flocks of the green bee-eaters—to Callian, which was in far-away times a very large and flourishing place, and the abode, among other ancients, of Chânakya, the teacher of King Sandrocottus or Chandra-gupta. Cosmos Indicopleustes came also hither, and in the Ratna-Mâlâ, or “Jewel-wreath,” it is written how, in the time of Vikram, A.D. 696, “the capital city, Kalyan, lies full of the spoils of conquered foes, of camels, horses, cars, elephants. Jewellers, cloth-makers, chariot-builders, makers of ornamental vessels, reside there, and the walls of the houses are covered with coloured pictures. Physicians and professors of the mechanical arts abound, as well as those of music, and schools are provided for public education. It is in order that he may at leisure compare the capital city of Ceylon with Kalyan that the sun remains half the year in the north and half in the south.”

By this time the vast wall of the Syhadris—black in the sunrise and golden in the sunset—is closely approached. The pointed buttress of the Parsik, the flat rampart of Parbul, the two sharp peaks of Jano Machchi, the “Cathedral Rocks,” and many another striking mountain mass, appear prominently along this great barrier which runs north and south for two hundred and twenty miles, affording only two breaks in all the extent of the continuous ramp where a cart road or railway could be constructed—the Bhor and the Tal Ghauts. At Kurjat the railway boldly attacks this enormous obstacle, beginning to climb aloft by a zigzag route of sixteen miles from the steaming Concan up to the breezy Deccan. In that distance the powerful engines lift the train nearly two thousand feet into the sky, by gradients oftentimes as steep as 1 in 37, dashing over aerial viaducts, diving into tunnels, rushing into dark cuttings, amid scenery alternately terrible and lovely, which now presents fair and far-stretching plains, dotted with rice-grounds and villages, and now abysses of awful depth, down which the gaze plunges a thousand feet, awed yet fascinated by the combination of gloomy rock and gleaming verdure, of streams trickling or foaming through the bottom of the lonely glens, and solitary hamlets shrouded by palms. Emerging at last under the level of Khandalla, a bungalow is seen perched upon the utmost edge of the very wildest crag of the range. The garden wall of this singular abode skirts a ravine fifteen hundred feet deep, which used to be the haunt of numberless tigers, leopards, bears, and other forest denizens. Wolves, wild boar, and the great Indian deer, called “bara-singh,” or “twelve-horns,” are still comparatively common about Lanowli and throughout the brink of the table-land, which here brings us into the plateau of Central India, upon the wide maidans and rocky flats of Maharashtra, the “Great Kingdom,” the Deccan of the Peishwas. In this region—familiar enough to myself in bygone years, but very strange in its new vegetation and curious isolated villages to my two dear companions—our train still flies along under the shadows of the quick-falling night, until Poona is reached, and we descend, in clouds of dry, white, fragrant Indian dust, at the capital of the Mahrattas.

THE BUND ROAD, POONA.

A drive next day about the cantonments and a walk through the native bazaars serve to disclose how little India changes amidst all the alterations, embellishments, and ameliorations which have come with the British reign. Twenty-three years will naturally make a difference alike in men and cities, and Poona in that period has become a much larger and handsomer station. Maidans, which once stretched without a tree or hut to the feet of the flat hills of Kirkee and Singhur, are now covered with bungalows and gardens; a fine new bridge spans the Moota-Moola, and my ancient College of the Vishrambagh has been replaced by a magnificent new edifice beyond the Bund, where the Brahman students find lodging as well as tuition. A charming public garden overlooks the water opposite Eroda, where fields of bajri and jowari once harboured quail and gave me many a good morning's sport; and all the suburbs outside the native city have been so transformed that I must confess to have wandered wholly lost amidst the labyrinth of new roads and houses, unable to identify the spot where I lived until after considerable research. The city itself, however, remains almost exactly what it was a quarter of a century—or, indeed, a century—ago. The same picturesque crowd of Brahmans, Purbhoos, Mahrattas,

Koombies, Gosaeins, Banias, bright-eyed women, and naked brown babies fills the narrow lanes and the great bazaar of the Moti-chouk. The same painted house-fronts open their little shops—with the merchant a-squat amid his small commodities—to the chattering street. There still are the old temples in full swing; Nandi the stone-bull is staring, as always before, into the open bhut-khana at the corner of the potters' quarter, where Siva sits in red and gold under his canopy of snake-heads. Round the great red Lingain in the next street on the right hand used to be ranged in succession a sweetmeat shop, a dyer's shed, a tobacco-stall, and a store for the sale of purple and green glass bangles. We turn, and there they are, the old-established emporiums, about as large as a piano-case, son succeeding father in the usual Hindu fashion, so that he who comes in the same way after another quarter of a century's absence will probably find the next generation of Poona dealers keeping up in the same abodes the same settled business. Here and there fire has destroyed some well-remembered building, and the outer quadrangle of my pleasant old Vishrambagh lies, alas! in ruins. We enter, and pass up the familiar stairs into the familiar diwan-khana, its windows looking out as ever through the carved teak-columns and arches of Hindu grace, upon the palms and plantains still waving over the same stone tanks. Underneath the College walls the same potter, so it seems, is banging a gindi into conventional shape, who was at work upon it in 1861; and the same women

POONA, FROM BEYOND THE BUND.

—one would almost say—are beating their wet clothes upon the slabs by the well, or pouring lotas of water over their comely bodies. An old gatekeeper of the College—not so much older than he used to look, notwithstanding these many years—makes many salaams, and “Sadhoo” presently brings up other people of the quarter who recognise the former “Principal.” A good many well-remembered faces have, however, quitted this world of illusions for “Swarga.” Krishna Shastri is dead, Kero Punt is dead, Baba Gokhley is dead! The list is long and sad, but the quiet, happy life of my little quarter of Aitwar-Pet goes on, and things are generally pretty well with everybody.

Then we visit the grand new College, which has replaced that ancient Mahratta Palace where I taught my Brahmans and Parsees; and find, with a certain feeling of envy, mixed with satisfaction, Gunpati, the God of Wisdom, much better lodged now than in the days when education was beginning in the Deccan. The Persian Professor and the Acting-Principal show us the halls and lecture-rooms of their imposing edifice, which stands finely amid an extended prospect stretching from the battlefield of Kirkee to Koregaon, beyond the “Sister-hills.” The same afternoon is fixed for a little expedition to Hira Bagh, “the Diamond Garden,” and to the temple of Parvati, which takes us again through the unchanged, unchanging Hindu city. The vegetation of the Deccan is seen to perfection in this pretty retreat, where sacred fig-trees and palm-clumps, bamboos and tamarinds, mangoes and the gold-flowering baubul make a delicious shade. As we wander by the large lake covered with Indian rushes and aquatic plants a brown and white snake slips from beneath our feet into the clear water, and swims quickly away to the shelter of a ruined wall. This silent ubiquity of deadly serpents in India gives a watchful feeling to the wanderer about her groves and buildings. They turn up just when you expect them least. Last week, at Malabar Hill, a resident, sitting in his verandah, heard a rustling beneath his chair, and taking the sound for his little dog's movement, snapped his fingers under the seat, calling the animal. Nothing answering, he looked, and, to his horror, saw two cobras there dallying with his suspended palm. All the same, one may sometimes pass half a year without ever seeing a snake; but how really awful is the power of their fangs may be judged from the fact that between 1875 and 1880, 103,000 persons died from snake-bite in British India, and 1,073,546 poisonous reptiles were killed for the Government reward. It is a curious fact that you may boil snake-poison without diminishing its venomous properties, which seems to prove that there are no germs in it. Permanganate of potash, however, renders it quite inert.

Parvati's Hill, with the renowned temple on its summit, overlooks the "Diamond Garden." A long and winding flight of spacious stairs leads up to the shrine, so gradual that mounted elephants can quite easily carry visitors or pilgrims to the platform of the Deity. Parvati, the "Mountain Goddess," the Mater Montana

PARVATI'S TEMPLE AND HILL, POONA.

of Rome, was Siva's consort, and is worshipped everywhere in India under forms now terrible, now lovely and benign. Among the latter is her personification as Annapurna, "the food-giver" of the household, which sounds strangely like the Anna Perenna of the Romans, also adored as the Dispenser of Plenty. Moreover, the great festival of Parvati occurs in Chaitra, just as that of the Latin goddess in the Ides of March. India has taught the West more than people dream! Parvati was also the presiding Deity of Sati sacrifices. Half-way up the ascent to the holy hill is seen a stone memorial of a Sati, with the usual hand, arm, and foot marks engraved which show that a Hindu widow here immolated herself. The bright-eyed Brahman lad who conducts us points to the spot with pride, and is astonished to learn, when he speaks half regretfully of the abolition of this antique rite of self-sacrifice, that it was never in any way common in India, the instances of Deccan Satis not amounting in any one year to more than eight or nine hundred. That unselfish and perfect love which could make a woman forego life for her husband was naturally never so particularly common that, even in India, every city could furnish a Hindu Alcestis once or twice a week; as seems occasionally supposed. Here, however, was, at any rate, the place where one such great-hearted wife—believing the Shastras, which promise union in heaven with the dead man, and as many lakhs of happy years with him as there are hairs upon the dead man's body—here was the spot where some Hirabae or Gungabae gave her gentle life to the flames, undeterred by the heaped-up wood and lighted torches, unrestrained by the beauty of this Deccan prospect which stretches, fair and fertile, to Sivaji's distant fortress-peaks. The Romans—Stoics as they were—knew the custom, and admired it. Propertius writes :

“ Uxorum fuis stat pia turba comis ;
 Et certamen habet lædi, quæ viva sequatur
 Conjugium ; pudor est non licuisse mori.
 Ardent victrices, et flammæ pectora præbent, Imponuntque suis ora perusta viris.”

It was not very wrong of me, it may be hoped, to lay a flower upon the carved stone which recorded where the Sati—the “Excellent One”—had last set her fearless-foot upon this earth of selfish hearts and timid beliefs. The verse translated from the “Hitôpadésa” came vividly to my mind :

“ When the Hindoo wife, embracing tenderly her husband dead, Mounts the funeral pyre beside him, as it were a bridal bed ;
 Though his sins were twenty thousand, twenty thousand times o'er told,
 She should bring his soul to Swarga, for that love so strong and bold.”

The “Adi Granth” of the Sikhs well says, no doubt, against the old practice, “They are not Satis who perish in the flames, O Nanuk ! Satis are those who live on with a broken heart.” Yet it was a splendid courage and a beautiful faith which inspired those Indian wives. The ritual was most solemn. The widow bathed, put on new and bright garments, and, holding Kusa grass in her left hand, sipped water from her right palm, scattered some tila grains, and then, looking eastward, quietly said, "Om! on this day I, such and such a one, of such a family, die in the fire, that I may meet Arundhati, and reside in Swarga; that the years of my sojourn there may be as many as the hairs upon my husband, many crores multiplied; that I may enjoy with him the felicities of heaven, and bless my maternal and paternal ancestors, and those of my lord's line; and that, praised by the Apsarasas, I may go far through the fourteen regions of Indra; that pardon may be given to my lord's sins, whether he have ever killed a Brahman, broken the laws of gratitude and truth, or slain his friend. Now do I ascend this funeral pile of my husband, and I call upon you, guardians of the eight regions of the world, of sun, moon, air, of the fire, the ether, the earth and the water, and my own soul. Yama, King of Death! and you Day, Night, and Twilight! witness that I die for my beloved by his side upon his funeral pile." Is it wonderful that the passage of the Sati to her couch of flame was like a public festival; that the sick and sorrowful prayed her to touch them with her little fearless, conquering hand; that criminals were let loose if she looked upon them; and that the horse which carried her was never used again for earthly service?

The bright-eyed Brahman lad, Hari Govind, was son of the hereditary priest of the temple, and would himself some day succeed to the charge of the great goddess and of her house upon the hill. He talked English volubly and well, and was reading Macaulay's History. A promise of some English books pleased him more than the offering he was expecting to receive for the poor of the temple; and he did us the honours of the shrine with alacrity and grace. He lighted up the largest "adytum" of the goddess, in favour of such very special and interested visitors; showing the great silver image of Mahâdeo sitting in the darkness, with Parvati his consort on one knee, and Gunpati on the other, both wrought in solid golden plates; also two great snakes in silver and gold rearing their shining hoods overhead. When it was laughingly suggested that, since I knew it, I should recite the sacred verse, the Gâyatrî—which only Brahmans must ever utter, and which it is unspeakable profanation to hear from other lips—the boy took it very lightly, only observing, "Nako"—"Please don't!" Hari Govind, I think, cared very little, but he had the proprieties to observe and defend. There were worshippers in the temple precincts, laying little offerings in front of the barred shrines—flowers, nuts, leaves of holy trees, anything—for Mahâdeo values the motive more than the gift, and the Bhagavad-Gîta says:

"He who shall proffer me, in heart of love
A flower, a leaf, a fruit, water poured forth, Hath worshipped well."

There is no regular ritual for a Hindu temple. The priests keep the lamps alight day and night before the god, and say the befitting mantras at sunrise, noon, and sunset; but every man and woman comes, when he or she will, to clasp their palms, make namuskâr, present their gift, and prefer their silent requests. The people believe in such things, to tell the truth, rather more than the educated priests. A Hindu official of the shrine, who called upon us the same evening—an old pupil of mine in the Government College—was quietly sceptical about the power of Parvati, and the value of prayers to her. This dialogue occurred: “You live with the goddess, Shastri! Is she beneficent? Does she tell you secrets of this life and of the next which Science in our West can never understand?” He answered: “Who knows more than is known, Saheb? We do as our fathers taught us, and we believe as we were taught; but the goddess is silent, and nobody comes back from the burning-ground to say if we are right or wrong.”

The best thing about the Temple of Parvati is, after all, the horse-shoe window—part of the palace built here by Baji Rao, and since destroyed by lightning—whence that last of the great Peishwas watched the battle of Kirkee. The view thence is simply perfect, as a landscape of Deccan hills, fields, and woods. It can, however, have attracted very little of Baji Rao's attention on the fatal day when he saw his eighteen thousand horsemen broken and routed by Colonel Burr's small force of two thousand Sepoys and eight hundred English. That day the “Goddess of the Hill” must assuredly have been offended or ungrateful, in spite of the vast gifts which the Peishwa bestowed on the Brahmans, since, under her own temple, she allowed the Jarî Patkâ, the golden pennon of Moro Dikhshah's Deccan chivalry, to be trampled under foot, and this fair land to pass for ever to the stranger.

VII.

NAUTCH DANCES, PLAYS, AND JEWELS.

ON the evening of our visit to the city of Poona and to the sacred hill of Parvati, we were invited to a nautch dance at the house of an old pupil and most esteemed friend, Mr. Dorabji Pudumji. It is the custom on festive occasions to illuminate the gardens and house-fronts with numberless oil-lamps set on pyramidal stands, or suspended in the trees. A flood of light, therefore, welcomes the guest on arrival, and he passes into spacious apartments equally bright, with candles in brass buttis, or handsome glass chandeliers. There is nowhere greater grace or cordiality of greeting than among the educated families of India; but, in truth, this is the land of fine and noble manners, and, from the cultivated Parsee and Mohammedan to the peasant and the peon, the Western traveller may receive, if he will, perpetual lessons of good breeding.

The ladies of my old friend's family were ranged round the large central room in dresses of light gauzy muslins or silks delicately embroidered, and dyed with all the loveliest tints imaginable, rose colour predominating. The effect was like a garden of beautiful flowers. The gentlemen wore black coats and hats of the well-known Parsee fashion, with trousers of crimson or white. In the centre of the apartment sate the two nautch girls, Wazil-Bukhsh, a Moham- medan, and Krishnâ, a Hindu, both amazingly arrayed in skirts of scarlet and gold, with saris of bright hues, plentifully spangled, tight gilded trousers, and anklets of silver and gold bells, which make a soft tinkling at every movement of the small brown feet. Behind them stand their three musicians, one playing the saringi, a sort of violin, the other the tamboora, a deep-sounding kind of violoncello, and the third provided with a bass and treble drum tied round his waist on an ornamented scarf. The girls rose to their feet, salaamed, and one of them began a slow pas, advancing and retreating with rhythmical waving of hands and measured beat of foot, which the other dancer then repeated. Next followed a song, or series of songs, delivered in high head notes, and principally of an amatory character. "My beloved is absent, and by day there is no sun in the sky, no moon for me at night! But he is coming, ek hath Khali—' with one hand empty'—yet in that he carries me back my heart." Then Krishnâ sang the "Taza ba Taza," the musicians advancing and retreating with her tinkling paces, leaning over the absorbed performer, and seeming in the intensity of their accompaniment to nurse the singing and draw it forth note by note. After this the Muslim girl and her Hindu sister executed together a famous dance called the "Kurrar," which consists of a series of character pictures. They placed coquettish little caps of spangled velvet on their black hair, and acted first of all the Indian jeune amoureux, adjusting his turban, stroking his moustache, and pencilling his eyebrows. Then it was Govinda, one corner of the sari twisted up to represent the bansula, on which the light-hearted god piped to the shepherdesses, and Radha listening and singing. Next—to the same never-ending rise and fall of the amorous music—Wazil Bukhsh became a love-sick maiden in the jungle, picking blossoms to fasten in her hair, and Krishnâ followed, enacting a serpent-charmer. Blowing on the beaded gourd that snake music which brings the hooded cobra forth from his deepest hole, she swayed her lithe body over the imaginary reptile, chanting the notes of the dreamy, bewildering, beguiling song; bent herself over the half-entranced snake, coaxing him out with long, low, weird passages of wild melody, until the charm was supposed to have triumphed, the serpent was bewitched and captured; whereupon Krishnâ rose to her feet and, drawing the glittering fringe of her sari over her forehead, expanding it with both hands, so as to resemble a cobra's hood, she finished with the snake-dance, amid cries of "Shâbash" (well done)! which were acknowledged with deep salaams.

We were favoured after this, upon special request, with the Holi and the Wasanta songs, albeit not of the season; for Hindu singing is always more or less religious, and there are certain of these melodies set apart for the time of year, and for the daylight, and others which must never be given except after the hour of midnight. When the first portion was concluded the mistress of the house hung "hars," or garlands, of sweet-scented blossoms on the necks and wrists of the Nautch-dancers, since it is the custom always to honour them in this way before any other guests. Nor does anybody slight or abuse these Deva-dasas, or "servants of the god," though their profession is perfectly understood. In Southern India the nautchnee is married solemnly to a dagger, by a ceremony called Shej, and lives afterwards as a Bhavin, dedicated to the temple and the dance. But because so many of them can read, write, and are in fact the cleverest and most accomplished, as well as the most generous of their sex, the Hindus have come to shudder at the idea of education for their wives, and this is one of the greatest obstacles to female instruction. While they rested, and munched betel-leaf, a skilful player from Canara discoursed singular passages upon an eight-stringed sitar, accompanied by a boy upon the tamboora; and afterwards followed sweetmeats, and attar of roses, whereupon some of us had had enough, and we made adieux. The natives will, however, sit out whole nights, listening to such music, and watching the soft movements of the Nautchnees, which are the more interesting, of course, the better they are comprehended.

NAUTCH-GIRLS AT HOME.

In the evening the conversation turned upon the administration of justice, the inveracity of Hindu witnesses, and such like topics; and I was led—in defence of the thesis that Indians are as true as most people, and that their religions and lawgivers earnestly inculcate truth—to repeat some verses long ago written upon an old judicial theme in this very city of Poona. They ran :

THE INDIAN JUDGE.

A cloud was on the Judge's brow,
The day we walked in Aitwar-Pêt ;
I knew not then, but since I know
What held his earnest features set :

That great cause in the Suddur Court !
To-morrow judgment should be given ;
And in my old friend's troubled thought Conscience and prejudice had striven ;—

Nay, nay ! No juster Judge on bench !
But justice in this cause of "Wheatstone's"
Was hard to do. I could not wrench
His sombre eyes from Poona's street-stones.

Silent we threaded Môtî-chouk,
Paced silent past the Dharma-sâla ;
At last, half petulant, I spoke ;
"Here is our Sanskrit School—Pat-shâla !"

"See ! Listening to their grey Gooroo,
The Brahman boys read Hindu cases ;
Justinian and the Code for you,
Manu for them ! What solemn faces

"Range, in dark ring, around the book Wherefrom the grim Achârya preaches !"
He paused, and, with a wistful look,
Said : "Might one know what Manu teaches ?"

So drew we nigh the School, and paid
Due salutations ; while the Master—Proud to be marked by Sahebs—made
The strong shlokes roll, fuller and faster.

“ Na vismayéta tapasâ
Vadédishtwa cha nanritan
Na parikîrttay êt datwâ
Nartti' pyapavadéd vipran.”

“ Namutra hi sahâyartham
Pita mata cha tishtatas
Na jnatir na putradâram
Tishtati dharma kēvalas.”

All down to Kasarîrinam

Gravely the Shastri chants the verses, Rocking his head ; while, after him,
 The turbaned class each line rehearses.

“ What is the lesson ?” asked my friend,
 With low salaam, reply was given :
 “ Manu’s Fourth Chapter—nigh the end—
 At Shloke two hundred thirty-seven.”

Then, turning to the brightest-eyed
 Of those brown pupils round him seated, “ Gunput,” the Shastri said, with pride,
 “ If it shall please my lords, can read it.”

We nodded ; and the Brahman lad—
 At such great charge shy, but delighted—In what soft English speech he had The Devanâgiri recited :

“ Be not too proud of good deeds wrought !—
 When thou art come from prayer, speak truly !—
 Even if he wrongeth thee in aught Respect thy Gooroo ! Give alms duly ;

“ But let none wist ! Live, day to day,
 By little and by little swelling
 Thy tale of duty done—the way
 The wise ant-people build their dwelling ;

“ Not harming any living thing :
 That thou mayst have—at time of dying—
 A Hand to hold thee, and to bring Thy footsteps safe ; and, so relying,

“ Pass to the farther world. For none
 Save Justice brings there ! Father, mother,
 Will not be nigh ; nor wife, nor son,
 Nor friends, nor kin ; nor any other

“ Save only Justice ! All alone
 Each entereth here, and each one leaveth
 This world, alone ; and every one
 The fruit of all his deeds receiveth

“ Alone—alone ; bad deeds and good !
 That day when kinsmen, sadly turning,
 Forsake thee, like to clay or wood,
 A fragment fitted for the burning.

“ But Justice shall not quit thee then,
 If thou hast served her ; therefore never Cease serving ; that she hold thee, when
 The darkness falls which falls forever ;

“ Which hath no road, nor ray to guide.
 But Justice knows the road ; the midnight
 Is noon to her. Man at her side Goes through the gloom safe to the hid light.

“ And he who loved her more than all,
 Who purged by sorrow his offences,
 Shall shine in realms celestial With glory, quit of sins and senses.”

. . . . .
 What made my friend so softly lay
 His hand on Gunput's naked shoulder
 With gentle words of praise, and say—
 His eyes grown happier and bolder—

“ I too have been at school ! Accept Thanks, Gooroo ! for these words imparted.”
 And when we turned away he kept Silence no more, but smiled, light-hearted.

And, next day, in his Indian court,
 That summing-up he did declaim us—
 Straight in the teeth of what was thought—
 Which made “ His Honour ” feared and famous.

Later on there was a special performance at the Hindu Theatre, in the Boodwar Pet, for our behoof. The play was to have been a dramatised version of "Tara," the well-known Indian tale of Meadows Taylor; but the Hindu girl who always took the principal part was unable to attend, and the piece given was therefore—so the bill informed us—"A Sataric drama" in twenty-six acts, and with countless scenes. It was a recent production of two Poona authors, and interesting chiefly as a picture of modern Mahratta life. As an acting play its flow was spoiled by the incessant and measureless soliloquies of one Rambhao, a designing person who plots against the loves of Krishnaji Punt and Ramâ, the pretty and clever heroine. The female parts were very well sustained by Hindu girls, which is of itself a vast innovation, as women used never to be seen on the Indian stage. These, indeed, were Nautchnees, who had been trained for the unusual task, and discharged it intelligently; mingling dancing and singing with acting. It was notable to have a Ramoosie, one of the robber tribe of the Deccan, introduced as a man capable of any crime, quietly engaging to set fire to Krishnaji Punt's house for a reward of three rupees. The scene which ensued was managed with much spirit and effect. Krishnaji is entertaining his friends with a nautch, which is duly performed before the seated company from the first scrape of the saringi to the hars placed on the neck of the dancer, when a glare of light breaks through the tatties, and a conflagration is beheld that threatened to wrap spectators, actors, and edifice in one common ruin. The theatre was merely a kutchra building, put together with scaffolding-poles and mats, and furnished with sofas and chairs for the quality, and with rude benches for the pit and gallery. The latter was set apart for women and girls, of whom a good many attended; and the body of the theatre was full of the vast white and scarlet turbans of the Poona Brahmans and Purbhoos. At act xii. we left,—having to return to Bombay by an early train—after about four hours of the woes and joys of the Mahratta lovers; but their fortunes were faithfully followed by an excited and attentive audience until four or five o'clock a.m., when the drop-scene—terrible with a gaily-coloured picture of “Bhowani destroying the Demons”—would be finally lowered.

At Bombay we dined—a large party of Europeans and Parsees—at the house of an eminent and very accomplished Mohammedan gentleman, Mr. Bedroodeen Tyabji, who not only did the honours of his mansion with the dignity natural to well-bred Moslems, but sat at meat with us, and received afterwards English and Hindu guests, until the large apartments were crowded. Next day an even more numerously attended reception took place at the residence of a Parsee magistrate of distinction, where, once again, this new and happy mingling of the races in the utmost harmony was witnessed. Before quitting Bombay for Poona it was also our good fortune to visit a Hindu household, very well known, where all the ladies of the family frankly met and conversed with their English friends, abandoning wholly the old restrictions of the "purdah." One of them wore what seemed to an unlearned judgment simply the most beautiful dress ever draped about a woman. It consisted of an under-skirt of silver tissue with silver edgings, and over this a sari of aquamarine silk—dyed in a delicate indescribable tint between the green of the robin's egg and the blue of the turquoise—with rich embroidery of crimson and gold. The wearer was as graceful and charming as the costume was lovely; and, indeed, it needs the soft brown face and limbs of an Indian lady to bring out the contrast of such exquisite garments. For yet another instance of the relaxing bonds of old Hindu seclusion it may be mentioned that we were received in a specially friendly manner at her house in Poona by the Princess Kamabae, daughter of the late Guicowar of Baroda. Her Highness sate unceremoniously outside the purdah, with the Princes, her sons Bapoo Saheb and Bhao Saheb; and chatted in Mahratta as freely as an English lady. She had certain political woes and grievances, of which she earnestly spoke—not at all necessary to mention here—but the time was when no male eye except her husband's and brothers' could have gazed on the unveiled countenance of a Princess of the great House of the "Cow-Herds."

From Bombay to Baroda by the night mail is a run of about 250 miles—the train passing along the sea-shore, among endless groves of date and cocoa palms, and through the towns of Broach and Surat. Baroda is a Mahratta capital, and we were to be the guests there of his Highness the Guicowar, whose princely hospitality was dispensed in his absence by his Dewan, or chief minister, the Kazi Saheb Shaha-buddeen, one of the most enlightened and accomplished statesmen of India. The young Guicowar was away in the jungle, shooting panthers and spearing wild boars upon his vast game preserves at Dekhâ; but we were made free of his city in the most generous way, with elephants, horses, carriages, and every comfort at our disposal, the Kazi being our courteous entertainer. Mr. Elliot, who educated the young prince, gave interesting particulars of his character and intentions, which are such as to promise favourably for the future of this important State. Suddenly called from humble life in a village of the Deccan to ascend the proudest gadi of Maharashtra, he has shown his royal breed by developing a princely disposition—becoming studious, earnest, and full of noble projects for the good of his people. Under his rule, guided by the high intelligence of his Dewan, barbarous customs, like the beast-fights, have become more or less thoroughly abolished, education is being extended to the low-castes and villagers, and municipal improvements of a sweeping kind are in progress. Beneath a gentle exterior he possesses a strong mind and royal decisiveness, and will live, it may be hoped, to prove a blessing to his subjects, who have suffered much under the cruel Khunderrao, and the vicious and guilty Mulharrao.

A splendid palace is in course of construction for him near the station. It is of Oriental architecture, embellished with domes and pinnacles, and enriched with endless carved stone and marble work. This lordly abode will cost £750,000 when finished, and the Guicowar will bring thither the young bride just found for him among his own people of the Mahratta blood.

It is somewhat odd to hear Hatti taiyar hai, "the elephant is ready," announced as naturally as though it were a cab or carriage which stands waiting at the door. Yet the least experienced might safely climb to the mountainous back of Bhairava, one of the Guicowar's quietest and biggest tuskers. Caparisoned in scarlet and yellow, with a forehead-cloth of kincob, which the mahout pushes aside when he desires to prod the mighty beast on the occiput with the pointed hook, Bhairava seemed grand and ponderous enough to be wholly above serving as a sort of colossal omnibus. At the word "baitho," however, he meekly folded his hind legs and stretched his front legs forward, lowering his body to the earth, whereupon a ladder of ten steps, set against his side, enabled us to climb to the silver howdah, where a party of four can be comfortably accommodated. Then Bhairava heaved majestically aloft—a movement which demands precaution on the part of the passengers—and rolled forward on a trip of circumambulation round the city and its suburbs. Behind him ran a hattiwallah, uttering gruffly many a "sum!" and "chutt!" to keep the monster going, and sometimes emphasizing these ejaculations with a tremendous blow upon the elephant's tail-root from a staff four inches thick, which would have broken the leg of a horse, but seemed to be regarded by Bhairava as the merest and most playful hint to "move on."

Our first turn was in the "Public Park," outside the city, a charming expanse of flower-gardens, lawns, and pools, established for the use and enjoyment of the citizens. Baroda means, by its Sanskrit derivation, the "Place of Fair Waters," and is well provided by its little river, the Vishwamitra, with the element which cools and fertilises these hot plains. In the park are pretty pavilions and white marble bridges, as also a menagerie, where we saw some tame and quite gentle panthers, two furious young tigers, fresh from their jungles at Pawangurh, the "Hill of the Winds," and three Guzerat lions; for in Kattiawar, whither we next repair, is the only spot on the earth's surface where lions and tigers are found in the same district. A panther-cub five months old, about as big as a large cat, was nursed and caressed by the ladies, the beautiful little beast being entirely docile; and we observed antelope and wild boar tethered close by upon the grass. In the trees the birds supplied another and gratuitous portion of this Indian collection, for the foliage was full of green parrots, chattering mynas, bee-birds, Malabar pheasants, shrikes, bulbuls, blue-winged rollers, sun-birds, and "coppersmiths." The striped palm-squirrel was of course everywhere, chirping and chevying up and down the neem and peepul trees; and now and then a monkey gravely descended and sate, with pendent tail and wide brown eyes, to watch the visitors.

OUR ELEPHANT AT BARODA.

Afterwards, Bhairava rolled along, in a movement resembling a prolonged earthquake, to the farther gateway of the city, stopping to let us remark a huge rhinoceros chained up under a grove of trees, who used to do battle with men and elephants for the sport of the Guicowar's court. "Gonda," we were informed, had had many a tough tussle, and would "go" at anybody or anything, when well fed and irritated by the sight of fire. We traversed on the elephant's back the wide sandy enclosure wherein these Beast Fights were held—a large oblong shut in by high walls, and provided with strong places of refuge. Here elephants in must were periodically turned loose to be baited by mounted desperadoes, who pricked them with sharp lances and goaded them to combat each other, or charge their assailants. Barodians say it used to be a splendid spectacle to watch a well-horsed Mahratta cavalier, exasperating and then evading the furious elephant, allowing the beast to touch with his trunk the flank of his steed, and then, with a spur-stroke, lifting himself out of the difficulty, and wheeling round in the rear of the trumpeting, maddened Behemoth. Khunderrao would sometimes give a bill for ten thousand rupees to be fastened upon one of the tusks of these infuriated creatures, promising it to the man who dared to snatch

the prize, and more than one "pailwan" was crushed to death endeavouring to win that cruel guerdon. At the eastern corner of the enclosure is a roofed pavilion, whence the Princes of Baroda were wont to view these exciting scenes; but the present Guicowar has practically abolished them, and the old rhinoceros, who has waged many a battle there, and grunted savagely at Bhairava, is now a retired pensioner.

The four main streets of Baroda intersect each other at a curious central arched structure, something like a Chinese pagoda. They are thronged with an ever-moving crowd of brightly-clad and busy people, and the windows of the upper storeys, and the little galleries of the painted houses, into which you look familiarly from the howdah of your elephant, are equally full of men, women, and children, living the open-air life of Hindu citizens. Nothing astonishes after a certain experience of these picturesque populations. It is quite ordinary to meet a cheetah, led along the public pathway; to see a naked, muttering fakir smeared with ashes, squatted on the pavement; hundreds of square painted kites flying across the narrow lane; the dead man on his bier blocking the way of the living; the snake-charmer with his basket of cobras; the devotee prostrate at the temple, or perambulating the sacred tree; mingled in the endless files of women with children and chatties, and the moving mob of coloured turbans, like countless flowers. Before our elephant rode two sowars of the Guicowar, in blue and gold, and behind us the Fouzdar himself in a carriage, so that Bhairava clove the sea of heads without difficulty, the people good-humouredly suspending their work or pleasure with kindly salaams, to let the guests of their Prince pass through the narrow or broad thoroughfares.

The ride concluded with a call at the Guicowar's city palace to inspect the State jewels. Indian ladies call these santôsha, "contentments;" and she indeed must be hard to satisfy, of whatever complexion or country, who would not be made happy with but a small portion of the Regalia of Baroda. The chief Karkoon of his Highness first drew forth from an old marmalade pot of tin seven or eight splendid articles of gemmed work, a lovely emerald ring, a bunch of rubies like sultana grapes, a priceless diamond bracelet, an engraved dark-tinted sapphire, and earrings of pearls to marvel at and to covet. Next he opened a series of silk-covered cases disclosing, among other wonders, a necklet of five hundred table diamonds clasped with great emeralds, one of the diamonds being as big as a thrush's egg, and known as the "Star of the Deccan." There was a necklet also of pearls—seven rows and a pendant—each picked to a nicety, and swelling gradually from the size of a pea to that of a grape, all perfect for milky beauty. Altogether, the precious vanities represented a value of over three-quarters of a million, and we were not surprised to find them guarded by Sepoys with fixed bayonets, and provided with a barred iron strong-room for greater security. At the Resident's table that evening the Kazi Saheb quoted the line of Saadi, where the poet praises poverty and humility, and says that "the branch which is most full of fruit hangs lowest down." Still, there are in this world some branches at the top of the tree, tolerably stiff in their carriage, which seem pretty well supplied with fruit.

VIII.

A MODEL NATIVE STATE.

WE are living in a bungalow allotted to us by the hospitality of the Thakoor of Bhaonagar, his Highness Rawul Shri Tukhtsinghjee Saheb. Plentiful verdure of acacia and mango trees relieves the dry grass and cloudless sky, and a sea breeze sighs lightly through our painted kus-kus curtains from the creek which runs into the little city out of the Gulf of Cambay. A Hindu temple, sacred to Mahadeo, peeps, white and graceful, over one corner of the compound, and over another rises the roof of the Thakoor's palace. Two of his sowars—stalwart Rajput cavalry-men, in uniforms of scarlet and amber, with long curved sabres, and mounted on wiry Kattiawar stallions—sit motionless in their saddles outside, ready to ride on even the most unmilitary errand. A water-wheel creaks, not unmelodiously, beyond the gate, pouring incessant streams and refreshing moisture over the thirsty plants and flowers in the Moti Bagh, the "Pearl Garden." Servants of the Prince, in scarlet liveries, told off for our comfort and tendance, sit about in groups, under the trees, or stand with crossed arms, waiting every order. The people of the city come and go in full view, the men in white, with high turbans, the women in many-coloured garments, bearing heavy loads on their heads; indifferent to the afternoon heat, which, for the European, seems considerable enough to render the hour of sunset desired. The great, milky-coated, high-humped cattle of Guzerat plod along the hot white road, with heads bent low in the wooden yoke, doggedly dragging huge loads of cotton, grain, or fodder. Some striped tents pitched in the grounds lend picturesqueness to the scene, and cast broad black shadows on the burned-up grass. Kites circle in the sky; parroquets and mynas fly about; and the merops, glittering in his bronze and emerald plumage, dashes at every fluttering butterfly, returning on each capture with his prey to the neem-branch, where he plucks off the jewelled wings of the insect, and devours its body, until the ground beneath becomes like a kaleidoscope with scattered colours. The Mihtarani passes, in crimson and blue sari, the lowest of the low for caste and for functions, yet walking under her load of refuse with erect figure and graceful gait like a brown statue. The Bhisti, with his cream-skinned bullock, laden with the heavy leathern mussaks of water, goes hither and thither, sprinkling the dusty paths. A pariah dog or two—"whose home is Asia and whose food is rubbish"—sleeps in the sun, having ascertained that nobody is energetic enough at present to throw stones at him. It is a typical afternoon in the Indian "cold weather," bright, placid, and salubrious.

We left Baroda by the mail train for Ahmedabad

and Bhaonagar, via Wudhwan, starting in the pleasant coolness of an Indian dawn. Guzerat is known as "the garden of India," and Baroda is the best wooded part of Guzerat, so that the day broke upon endless groves of clustered trees and broad stretches of fields green with many crops. Everybody seemed glad of the fair, cheerful morning; and I thought of that best of all Sancho Panza's proverbs: "Cuando Dios amaneece por todos amaneece." The popularity of every railway in India is remarkable. The third-class carriages, divided into compartments for male and female passengers, are crowded with chattering friendly swarms of natives, who have, apparently, heaps of relations and acquaintances at every station, and an immense deal to say to them. As soon as the train stops the pani-wallahs—the men with water—come round, and dispense a fresh supply of the element to thirsty lips, for it soon grows hot and dusty. A high-caste Hindu is always selected to carry up and down the station-chatty; the Brahman can then drink directly from this store: if a low-caste person is athirst a lota is emptied into his hands, and he quaffs from his hollowed palms, and then washes his perspiring face and mouth. Nevertheless, for all that strong survival of caste, the Hindus are a democratic and easy-going people, so that you will see a Thakoor's son, in turban of red and gold, with coat of delicately embroidered muslin, and strings of precious pearls round his neck, jostling amicably among coolies, cattle-drivers, and bunia folk. He would not, however, eat a morsel of bread with one of them, or, for the matter of that, with ourselves if he were pinched with utmost hunger.

As a rule, the natives hereabouts are remarkably good-looking. One hardly observes an ill-favoured face—many have countenances of the highest refinement and gentleness of expression; whilst some of the children of from eight to twelve are positively beautiful. But the mothers do not like to see them too openly admired. For this reason they often introduce into their dress some common article as a foil and counter-charm to the “evil eye,” just as they will occasionally plant one ugly, rough, wooden post among the handsome stone pillars of a house-front, and hang an old shoe round the neck of the most comely cow in a herd. To avert the chashm-i-bad from houses, the Hindu puts a whitened chatty on the gable, or amid his crops. A Hindu mother, if she thinks an evil glance has fallen on her little one, waves chillies and salt round its head, and afterwards burns them. One of the reasons for displaying jewels on the children is that the mischief-darting eye of the malevolent may fall there, and not on the boy or girl. Virgil’s Shepherd exclaims :

“Nescio quis teneros oculus mihi fascinat agnos,”

and the Indian mother, if her babes fall sick, says just the same thing.

As the train proceeds between Mehmulabad and Ahmedabad, it comes into a country full of apes—Shylock’s veritable “wilderness of monkeys.” At first the traveller can hardly believe they are not grey old men, squatted under the hedges, or grouped upon the embankments. Soon, however, he sees no end of monkeys "lollopping" off on either side of the advancing train in half-dozens and dozens, their long tails erect in the air, their puckered faces superciliously scrutinising the passing carriages. There are two varieties—the black-faced and the Hanuman—and hundreds of them are to be observed from the windows of the train, walking meditatively ahead on the rails; jumping over the cactus fences, perched with long drooping tails upon the branches of the trees, or solemnly assembled on some open field in a grave parliament of "four-handed folk," discussing the next plundering expedition. They steal in truth a good deal of fruit and grain, but the natives seldom or never molest them—thanks to the legend which recites how the Monkey-God helped Rama to recover Sita—and it is the oddest thing to watch a knot of Guzerati peasants walking through another knot of monkeys as if all alike were fellow-citizens.

After stopping during forty minutes for breakfast at Ahmedabad, the train turns into this remarkable peninsula of Kattiawar by way of Viramgam and Wudhwan. Near the latter place the territory of his Highness Tahkt-Singhi commences, and thence the Maharaja has, with his own resources, constructed an excellent railway which runs one hundred and four miles to his sea-coast capital of Bhaonagar. It is managed as well as any first-rate line in England, and passes over several bridges and viaducts of a very solid character. In an engineering sense it was easy enough to make, for almost all this part of Kattiawar is as flat as Lincolnshire, and you travel hour after hour through endless fields of cotton and wheat, the surface unbroken by anything bigger than an ant-hill. And here, again, it is astonishing how the people enjoy and value their railways. Every third-class is full of happy, chattering excursionists, in dresses which make a crowd of them look like a bed of tulips, the red sari and white puggree of the Rajput men and women predominating. The rivers which we cross, from time to time, are already much shrunken in their beds since the rains, and trickle to the Gulf of Cambay between broad expanses of sand. Yet there has been a good monsoon, and Kattiawar will this season supply many a yard of calico and many a loaf of bread to Manchester and London. There are no monkeys hereabouts, but a black buck is occasionally seen, with flights of sand-grouse; and the asoka, the "sorrowless tree," grows freely. Its spear-shaped, wavy leaves are not now diversified by the bright blossoms of orange, scarlet, and saffron which Wasanta-time will bring, but there is no tree more celebrated in Indian poetry. It was to the asoka that Damayanti addressed her pretty appeal, in the Mahábhárata, when she adjured the "Heart's Ease" to tell her where Nala had gone, and said to it:

"Truly 'Heart's Ease'—if, dear 'Heart's Ease,' Thou wouldst ease my heart of pain."

The beautiful asoka is sacred to Siva as the lotus to Lukshmi, the jasmine and the crimson ixora to Vishnu, and the round golden blossoms of the kadamba to all the gods. It grows about as high as a large apple tree, and women love to cast its blooms into their bathing water. One charming superstition has it that the buds upon the asoka will instantly open into full splendour if the foot of a beautiful person touches its roots.

The soil hereabouts is full of nitrous salts, which dry in a white crust wherever water has been deposited. Yet it is evidently very fertile, and full of wells, built with the sloping platform, where white bullocks draw the big skins of water up, and then go backwards to plunge them in again to the monotonous song of the byl-wallah. But Kattiawar wants trees. Trees will save India, and are saving her, from the fate of Central Asia, desiccated by the nakedness due to waste of wood. The Forest Conservancy, promoted by the British Râj, is one of its greatest benefits to the peninsula. India would have been a "howling wilderness" if the sway of the Mogul or the Mahratta had lasted. It is her trees which hold the precious water in the earth and give shade, moisture, life. The peepul, the asoka, and the aswattha have never been half enough worshipped. Every forest officer is the priest of a true religion.

We were received with kindest welcome at the Bhaonagar Station by a very old friend, Mr. Muncherji Bhowmagri, the accomplished agent of the Maharaja, and also by the Diwan and the revenue officers of his Highness, who conducted us to the comfortable quarters provided by this enlightened Prince. The hospitality of an Indian sovereign comprehends everything—house, carriages, servants, cooks, furniture, kit, flowers, books, letter paper, fruit, food, whatever possibly can be needed—all is found foreseen and prepared. Dinner and a quiet night soon dissipate the fatigues of travel, and early next morning the chief representatives of the State pay their visit of welcome. They are Nâgar Brahmans of the best class, speaking English fluently—for this is the Court language here—and among them are gentlemen in the highest degree experienced and capable as administrators. It would be difficult, indeed, to encounter anywhere statesmen better informed upon the affairs of their own and other countries than the Diwan and the Finance Minister of Bhaonagar; but we are arrived, as I have noted already, at a model Native Principality. Nor does Poona or Bombay contain many Shastris with clearer conclusions on Hindu theology and philosophy, better command of lucid language, or ideas more enlightened and profound, than Mr. Manilal Nabubhai Dvivedi, Professor of Sanskrit in the Samuldas College here, whose book just published on the Râja Yoga ought to become widely known among the learned in Europe; and to converse with whom has been a real privilege.

In company with these gentlemen, the city and its environs have been pleasantly explored. Trade is brisk in Bhaonagar; the well-kept streets are full of busy crowds; the little shops do a constant commerce; in the port lie more than a hundred dhows, bug'as, or bunder-boats which have come from Kurrachee and Surat, Muscat and Mocha, Zanzibar and the Islands. The Thakoor spares no expense or pains to develop his capital. He has completed an excellent supply of pure water by "bundling" the lake at Gadechi; he has established a College, a High School, a Dispensary, a Horse-breeding Establishment, and a Cotton Exchange, and is building a spacious and handsome hospital. He has beautified the town with temples, tanks, and country villas, and is now erecting upon the "Pearl Lake" a lovely chhatri, or pavilion, in white Carrara marble, to the memory of his late favourite wife. Rawul Saheb is a prince of pleasant demeanour, courteous and frank, but with a truly royal dignity, evidently full of desire to develop his State and to benefit his subjects. We spent an agreeable afternoon at the palace, where all the "society" of Bhaonagar was gathered. The Maharaja—wearing his riband of the Star of India and a string of priceless pearls—received his guests at the door, who were led through spacious apartments to the Badminton court. There his Highness played a capital game with his Prime Minister, State Treasurer, and the English ladies, exchanging his scarlet and gold turban for a skull-cap, and thoroughly enjoying the pastime. A Court musician gave some native airs by striking basins of water of different sizes; and refreshments were handed round with champagne cup. Next we passed through lines of mounted guards to the Palace Gardens, prettily kept with all sorts of plants and flowers, where there were tame antelopes running about, and cages containing two Guzerat lions, a wild boar, some monkeys, civet cats, and other animals.

On returning from the gardens the conversation diverged to Rajput legends, one of which I was enabled to remember, and recited it to the satisfaction of many of the Rajput gentlemen present, if I might judge by the patriotic delight exhibited. A native poet was introduced, who has the gift of improvising interminable Guzerat verses upon ancient themes. The land is indeed full of strange folklore and legends, to collect which would repay the labour of any intelligent resident. The chiefs of Bhaonagar belong to the Gohil clan, which descends from the Solar Dynasty of Udaipore. They have fought, and "drunk from the white cup of peace," and fought again, ever since Akbar's time in 1580 A.D., and have a whole literature of bardic ballads. Every village possesses its martial or religious legend. At Dândretia is a well of sweet water, in the midst of the salt plain of the Bhâl. The story is that a merchant, named Dantásha, resided at Dântretia, whose son married a wife from Benares. When she came to her husband's house she was given salt water for bathing, but she refused to bathe in salt water, and washed with the water which she had brought from her home in a large earthen vessel. Her mother-in-law mocked her and said, "You had better arrange for your father to send you bathing-water daily." The bride, however, declared she would die of hunger rather than bathe in salt water, and for three days and nights she fasted, worshipping Gangáji with great devotion. At the end of the third night the river goddess appeared to her and told her to take all her relatives with her to a spot north of the village, and that there they would see her (Gangá) flowing. In the morning the bride begged her relatives to accompany her to the spot, but they laughed at her. At last they went, and to their surprise saw a stream of pure sweet water flowing out of a cleft. They then congratulated the bride, and after all bathing therein returned home. This stream is still sweet, and has ever since been named Gangwo.

Then, again, at Mándwâ, near Bhaonagar, there is a red Mahâdeo stone which marks where Lâ Gohil the Rajput rode into the sea to please his lord. The Raja Sidhráj had visited the sea coast, and come amongst other places to Mándwá. On a certain day the waves were very violent and the sea much agitated, at which time Sidhráj had gone down to the sea-shore attended by several horsemen. The King said, "He would be a brave man who would ride a hundred yards into the sea on a day like this." One of the horsemen replied, "There is no race so loyal and gallant as the Gohil; one of them might do it, but no one else would dare to do so." A Kattiawari answered, "The Gohil race is brave in talk, but their bravery shows itself by boastings in the market-place; there is no Rajput who would throw away his life for such a challenge." On hearing this Lá Gohil placed his hand on his moustache, badé them all farewell, and urged his horse into the ocean, where he was quickly overwhelmed.

And, once more, by way of a Buddhistic legend, there is the folk-tale told by the villagers of Moldi, a spot sixty miles south-west of Bhaonagar. Hereabouts is a large pasture (vid) close to Moldi, of which the Jhinjhá grass is very sweet, and the milk of both the cows and buffaloes of Moldi is of excellent quality. Some Chárans of the Panchál, who were dealers in grain, happened to visit Moldi and purchased a large quantity of grain in the neighbourhood. They loaded their animals and placed a quantity of Jhinjhá grass beneath their packs. Then they set out for Márwár, and when they reached Páli they alighted and sold their grain to a wealthy Wániá merchant. This merchant had a very beautiful wife. She put a straw of the Jhinjhá grass in her mouth and chewed it, and then smiled. Her husband, who was standing by, asked her why she smiled. She begged him not to press her to tell, but he insisted. Finally she informed him that in a previous incarnation she had been a doe antelope, and had been used to graze in the lands of Moldi, and that the grass there was specially sweet. When she put the straw in her mouth she at once recognised the flavour of the Moldi grass. Her husband questioned the merchants, and they confirmed her statement that the grass came from Moldi, but after telling her husband this she fell down and died.

The reception at the Maharaja's concluded with the accustomed distribution of Attar and Pán, the Prince himself placing garlands of flowers on the necks of every guest, giving to each a little gilded flask of rose essence, and sprinkling each bouquet with the gulab-dani. A similar visit was paid, by invitation, to the present Diwan, and also to his predecessor, the very accomplished Mr. Udaiyashankar Gouriashankar, C.S.I., a statesman who, for forty years, administered the affairs of Bhaonagar with great renown. Although now upwards of eighty years of age, this venerable Hindu gentleman retains all his faculties, together with a most retentive memory, which allows him to talk with singular erudition of his favourite Sanskrit studies. The apartment where he sate was full of ancient MSS., old inscriptions and carvings, fossils, coins, and bound books in Sanskrit, evidencing the wide and cultivated taste of the retired Minister. Two other visits of the utmost interest must be mentioned. These were to the High School and to the Bhaonagar College, both handsome and commodious buildings, which stand near each other in the city. A large number of bright, intelligent lads were gathered in the former, reading a lesson from the "Lady of the Lake." One of them, named Hari Shankar, had prepared for me a complimentary ode in Sanskrit, and chanted it in the true orthodox manner, not to be attained except by long training. In this college, however, only the Shastris, the native professors, were present, the students being away on examination.

After a courteous and cordial welcome from these learned Brahmans, a very interesting conversation arose, with the aid of Mr. Manilal, upon various philosophical and religious points. The Pundits were questioned about the origin of the Samas in Sanskrit writing, on the authorship and authenticity of the text of the Mahâbhârata, and the real meaning of Maya, or the "Doctrine of Illusion." We grew so friendly that no objection was made to the request that a passage from the Yajur-Ved should be recited in the ancient way—the way only known to very far-seen Brahmans after long years of instruction. A dark-faced "Twice-born" from Southern India, with dreamy emaciated face and ardent sunken eyes, cast off his shoes, bared his right shoulder, and covered his hands, while he began in the three mystical manners his recital of the sacred text. Some of those present, even among the Brahmans, had never listened before to those chanted formulas, the mere sound of which, fantastic as it seems to foreign ears, is salvation even to hear, and much harder to repeat correctly than the wildest and quickest patter song. We spoke next of the Bhagavad-Gîta, which calls all this verbal exercise "mere words;" and it was generally agreed that names and forms are nothing, that truth in all religions is one and the same; that—at the last—the Vedantist, the Buddhist, and the illuminated Western Philosopher see by one light.

It is, in truth, rather sad to perceive how completely some European observers mistake and misinterpret these Indian people on the question of their religion. They style them "idolaters"—imagine that Hindus attribute divine qualities to the uncouth figures, the red stones, the lingams, carved snakes, and grim Bhowanis which they worship. Because they find Mahadeo adored in one place, Gunpati in another, Kali elsewhere, and trees, rivers, and cows objects of prayer, they suppose the Hindus, one and all, polytheists. Yet it would be almost as unjust to ascribe polytheism to Londoners because one church is dedicated to St. Matthew, another to the Holy Trinity, a third to St. Bridget. All these various gods and sacred objects are for the educated Indian mere "aids to faith," manifestations—more or less appropriate and elevated—of the all-pervading and undivided Para-Brahm. Even the poor peasant of the fields, and the gentle Hindu wife, perambulating a peepul tree smeared with red, will tell you that the symbol they reverence is only a symbol. There is hardly one of them so ignorant as not to know that commonplace of Vedantism, "Every prayer which is uttered finds its way to the ears of Kêshava."

Take the Salagram, for instance, that fossil ammonite which the Hindu wraps in cloth, anoints, worships, and places near persons about to die. He will not even show it, it is so sacred to him; and he supposes that Vishnu is actually crystallised in the shell. But that is originally because of the marvel of the convolutions and chambered symmetry of the ammonite, with its glittering walls of silex and violet quartz.

The first consecrator of these things found the wonder and beauty of creation "writ small" upon the mysterious petrification, and in a sense he was right to adore it. In Bengal the household god is oftentimes a basket-full of rice, or a water-pot; and every Vaishnava abode has a Tulsi plant in its front (ocimum gratissimum) which is venerated as the wife of the Great God, but the family is aware, as well as any Christian, that Parvati is there only by grace, and fragrance, and beauty.

Among other agreeable experiences at Bhaonagar was a morning excursion to the country seat of the Minister, and a Nautch party, with fireworks, given at his city residence. The Maharaja himself attended on the latter occasion, when all the seven Nautchnees of the Court performed, and everybody in Bhaonagar gathered in front of the house to see the pyrotechnic display. I must confess that I entirely enjoy Indian dancing and music of a really superior style, and cannot understand how people find them tedious. You must not fidget and chatter; you must let the restless and feverish impatience of the European mind float peacefully on the stream of sustained song; you must orientalise the attention into a contented dreamy state, and then a good Nautch lulls and restores. These dancing-girls were very accomplished, and one of them chanted such a pretty Persian air, beginning Lâb rukhâ samanbarâ, that we got her to repeat the words, which are here translated:—

ZANOUBA'S SONG.

“O face of the tulip ! and bosom
 Of the jasmine ! whose Cypress are you ?
 Whose Fate are you, cold-hearted Blossom ?—
 In the garden of grace, where you grew,
 The lily boasts no more her fragrance,
 And the rose hangs her head at your feet ;
 Ah ! whose is that mouth like the rose-bud,
 Making honey seem no longer sweet ?

“You pass, taking hearts ; you ensnare one Like wine ; and your eyes dart a light
 As of arrows. Whose are you, most fair one !
 With brow like the crescent of Night ?
 Have you come to make me, too, your victim ?
 So be it ! oh, loveliest lip,
 Give now to this Slave who adores you
 One drop from that death-cup to sip.”

We paid our farewell visit to the Thakoor Saheb, feeling a real regret to quit so hospitable a capital. His Highness showed us his jewels, which are splendid, especially an emerald of unparalleled size and colour, a belt of sapphires and table diamonds, and some marvellous clusters of rubies for the ears and turban. He spoke with earnestness of his wishes to develop and benefit his State, and engaged us all never to forget Bhaonagar, which was an easy thing to promise after such boundless kindness. It is evident that the eloquent speech made by Mr. Peile at the accession of his Highness has been made the programme of the Thakoor's rule. Nursed by many years of British administration, during the minority of the Prince, Bhaonagar has become in every sense a “Model State”—destined, beyond doubt, to increasing prosperity and renown. We are breakfasting on nîl-ghai steaks this morning—before starting for Ajmere and Jeypore—having received the present of a fine young “blue bull” from a Norfolk sportsman who has dined occasionally with us at Bhaonagar.

IX.

THE MOSQUES OF AHMEDABAD.

AHMEDABAD, the finest city in the rich province of Guzerat, owes its origin, according to popular legend, to a beautiful face and to a remarkable spiritual manifestation. When Ahmed Shah, flushed with conquest, marched down to the banks of the Sâbarmati, he was pleased with the flat yet fair prospect; but still more pleased with the beauty of Siprá, the daughter of Assa, the Bheel chieftain. So he was minded to found a city by the river, where his dark favourite dwelt; but for this purpose desired to consult the Prophet Elijah, who was a sort of tutelary saint of the family. Accordingly the prophet was invoked with the aid of the Sultan's religious teacher, Sheikh Ahmed Kattu, who seems to have been a clairvoyant of the first order. The prophet appeared, and gave permission to establish the city, provided the Sultan could find four "Ahmeds" who had never once missed afternoon prayer. His Majesty and his religious instructor both bore that name, and could both boast that they had invariably attended the "Azan;" and after much search two other pious men were discovered in Guzerat, Kazi Ahmed and Malik

Ahmed, who had been as irreproachably regular in their devotions. Thereupon the foundations of the stately capital were laid, and the ruins visible to the south and east of the existing town show how splendid it must have appeared in the earlier part of the fifteenth century. To build his new city the conquering monarch freely pillaged the marble masonry of Chandraoti and Anhilwâda, the two antique Hindu capitals of Guzerat; and, later on, Mahmud Shah built the great wall which now encircles it, a massive rampart nearly six miles in circumference, having round towers at every fifty yards, the curtain being thirty feet high in many portions, and six feet thick. There are eighteen gates in this wall, each of them provided with huge folding-doors of teak, in the upper section of which sharp iron spikes are thickly planted, in order to prevent the elephants of a besieging enemy from battering them open with their heads.

Those curious little black and savage people, the Bheels, are proud of the memory of Assa, and also because, when a Rajpoot prince is installed, the tilka upon his forehead must be marked with a drop of blood taken from the toe or thumb of one of their wild chiefs. They may be seen with their bamboo bows and arrows, and amulets hung on the right side of the forehead, all along the Tapti and Nerbudda, and in the vicinity of this city, which was born of Sipra's dark loveliness.

Akbar, in his turn, greatly embellished the place, and opened broad streets where ten bullock-carts could drive abreast. Afterwards it declined, in consequence of the uprising of Champanîr near at hand and of internecine strife, until the Marathas occupied the fortress, from whom General Goddard and the British captured it in 1780, fighting against great odds. Now, Champanîr is a wilderness of ruins, overgrown with bindweed and milk-bush, where tigers couch and jackals litter; and Ahmedabad is grown again into a thriving city, containing a hundred and twenty thousand inhabitants, the headquarters of the Northern Division of the Bombay Army, and possessing one of the most picturesque and salubrious cantonments in India. There is, indeed, no finer road to be seen anywhere than that which leads from the city to the camp, under a three miles long avenue of red tamarind and peepul trees. And, crowded as the busy capital has become, its sanitary condition has so much improved that it is difficult to believe the dreadful record of 1813, when the plague swept through these lively bazaars and slew half of the population.

The great boast of Ahmedabad, as regards architecture, lies in its old Mohammedan mosques, built mainly of white stone, delicately and marvellously carved. Northern Guzerat and Rajpootana abound in a milky marble, often as pure in grain as Parian; and having this material, and all the débris of the Hindu capitals at hand, the Sultans of Ahmedabad reared during their reigns some of the loveliest little buildings in the world. They are all ruined and defaced now, and in more than one instance—such are the chances of Fate!—a Hindu custodian keeps the shrines of Islam; but their ancient beauty shines through their decay, and weeks of study would not exhaust the treasury of delicious things wrought here in snow-white blocks by the carvers and masons of the Mohammedan period. The city itself, in all its streets and lanes, is full of wonderfully fine work of the same kind, executed upon the timbers and wooden pillars of the houses. There winds, in fact, hardly a byway in Ahmedabad where you will not observe some main beam or “king-post” of a trader’s dwelling sculptured by the patient chisels of those true artists of old into admirable arabesques or fanciful figures of gods, men, and animals; for wood and stone carving seems to be an indigenous Hindu taste which the conquerors adopted. There are joists to be seen hereabouts, mouldering with sun and sand, that would have taught Grinling Gibbons new possibilities of his art, so marvellous and fantastic are the designs impressed upon the wood.

Among the many edifices which display the skill of those old artificers we visited the Rânî-kî-Masjid, or “Queen’s Mosque,” in the Mirzapura quarter. The minarets of this monument are broken off short at the level of the mosque-roof, and the place is so wild and neglected that some years ago a tiger is said to have been shot sleeping within a few yards of the fakir who always occupies the platform under the rozah. Bats hang in clusters beneath the fretted dome, and long-tailed monkeys squat upon the cornice, where Arabic, inscriptions in mother-of-pearl, or glazed colours, proclaim the glory of Allah and the merits of the pious founder. The window-work of pierced marble, however, remains utterly wonderful for its variety and delicacy. The silky stone is cut into patterns, which change with every lattice. They are all, no doubt, geometrical, for it is the Hindu only who revels in imitations of Nature, and loves to reproduce in marble climbing plants or the leaves and blossoms of the lotus. The Moslem, shunning all likeness of living things, has yet woven out of lines, circles, and triangles, and above all, from the plastic characters of his Arabic alphabet, designs of exhaustless fancy, through the fairy-like tracery of which the bright light winnows as if golden wine were poured through lace. There will be seen in all these buildings, first, a mosque proper, with minarets, a praying-place, and mimbar; and next, a rozah or garden-canopy, covering the tomb or tombs of those in whose name the edifice was erected. This is generally an open pavilion, with double rows of columns, supporting a central cupola surrounded by four small cupolas at the angles, the area being paved with marble, and approached by marble steps. The columns, symmetrically designed, are crowned with capitals, engraved, rather than merely sculptured, into minute luxurious embroidery of volute and scroll; and everywhere—on plinth and abacus, frieze and entablature—appears the same lavish wealth of work and fancy; for it is characteristic of the Hindu art, which the Moslem also in this respect adopted, to leave no naked places in the stone. Wherever artistic toil can be bestowed it is freely given; so that even the lower surfaces of all platform edges, and the hidden recesses of domes and niches are completely covered with beautiful labour, on the old Greek principle that "the gods see everywhere."

THE QUEEN'S TOMB, AHMEDABAD.

Near the Jamalpur Gate rises another exquisite mosque, possessing still unbroken its graceful minarets of white marble, and embellished in the same, or even in a more astonishing manner, with elaborate carvings and pierced work. One of the panels upon the principal building here, fashioned in a fairy-like pattern, is worked out of the solid stone, and all the lines "under-cut" like a Chinese ivory-ball, so that a finger inserted behind the work can feel the marble studs left to support the tracery. It would have been easier, and little less effective, to leave the solid stone beneath the pattern; but the faithful mason scorned such scamping work. An upright lamp-stand, wrought from the solid side of a column, stands here, of a conception admirable for elegance and utility; and the pillars sustaining the five cupolas of the rozah are well worthy to form a canopy for the relics of that beautiful princess, the Ranî Siprâ, to whose memory the mosque was erected. Briefly, words fail to describe the dainty loveliness of many among these Mohammedan memorials, dusty and decayed as they are at present. Some of them, like Haibat Khan's mosque, interest by exhibiting the way in which Muslim and Hindu styles of architecture were combined. The Manek Burg or "Ruby Tower" contains a window of perforated alabaster, by some Hindu master-hand, where the stems and foliage of a creeper are so simulated that nature is not more lithe and living than the stone. The carving on the Tîn Darwaza, or "Triple Gateway;" the lacework round the Tomb of Shah Alum; the sculpture at Dhaee Harir's Well, might each of them supply pages of admiring comment; and the by-gone opulence of Ahmedabad in these delicate triumphs of art may be gathered from the fact that in the sixteenth century there were not less than a thousand stone and marble mosques, tombs, and kiosques in or near her walls.

We visited also the pretty Kankaria tank and Nagina Gardens, near the city. This is an artificial lake, surrounded by steps of masonry and colonnades of marble, with an enchanting island in the middle, linked by a bridge and a causeway to the shore. The little palace in the island has been restored by the British Government, and affords a pleasant water-side retreat for the citizens of Ahmedabad. Kingfishers, green and blue, were hovering over the placid surface; the monkeys gambolled, and chattered in the tamarind trees, and flowers of a hundred hues were reflected along the edges of the verdant island. A Byrâgi, or religious ascetic—of an excellent taste in landscape, although personally much besmeared with ashes and hideous with holy rags—had pitched his station under a peepul tree near the bridge, and was being devoutly worshipped by some Hindus, with offerings of meal and fruit. It was a very good position for a man bent on carrying out the injunction of the Shastras, which say: "When the householder sees grey hairs in his beard, and the face of the son of his son, let him take a black antelope's skin, and, sitting under a sacred tree, meditate upon the Infinite." But the Byrâgi could of course have no son. His name, derived from the Sanskrit Vi-Rag, implies a person freed from all earthly desires; and—though not such a self-denying ascetic as the man whom Colonel Tod saw here, who had stood upright for thirty-seven years supported by a cross-bar, without once reclining—the saint at Kankaria declined a rupee, with polite contempt for earthly comforts.

The tank covers seventy-two acres, and is one of the largest in India. On a temple near its further extremity was stamped the impress of a hand in red ochre, which marks where a Sati had perished in the flames. The gates of cities, and the walls of burning-ghâts, as has been before remarked, often bear the same token of that passionate love or deep despair which in old days moved so many Hindu widows to die beside their husbands on the funeral pyre. One such Sati is commemorated at Karjâlâ, near Bhaonagar, in verses said to have been uttered by the victim. Her husband was called away to fight some plundering Bâbriâs at the moment when he was putting on the wedding coat, and fastening the mindhol berries to his right wrist. He was killed, and his bride before mounting the pile beside him, recited the lament still preserved in the place. It may be translated:

THE KANKARIA TANK, AHMEDABAD.

“ I shall not pace around the fire with thee,
 Lord of Karjâlâ, the red wreath is torn !
 I shall not wear the bridal-cloth, nor see Shel's happy banks ; for this I am forlorn !
 Thy men came back, but thou wilt never come !
 Lord of Karjâlâ ! bloody thou dost lie ;
 Oh, Wâjâ ! when the ship was well-nigh home
 It sank, and in these deep waves I must die.”

Such instances of wifely devotion—as has been also observed—were never very common in India ; which, indeed, the eager perpetuation of their memory proves. Some of them may have been due, no doubt, to the miserable prospects of widows here, for the lot of a Hindu widow, was, and still too often is, almost worse than any death. Some may be ascribed to the absence of any such fear of death in Hindustan as that which darkens the hearts and minds of European peoples. The Hindu is quite assured that he has lived many previous lives, and has many more to experience, and, whether Vaishnav or Shivaite, is troubled with none of the dismal doubts of modern materialism. It may be safely believed that the great majority of these little red hands stamped upon temple wall, city gate, or house-front commemorate martyrdoms of faithful love, well meriting the respect in which they are held by the common people, as examples forbidden henceforward, but in bygone times holy, admirable, and elevating.

One passes from Guzerat into the classic Hindu region of Rajputana over a plain, gradually losing its thickly wooded character. We stopped for a day, however, short of the southern confines of the Rajput country, at the seldom-visited station of Palanpur, the police magistrate of the district being a relation. Hence the road goes across a bare and glowing plain to Deesa, the well-known cantonment on the Banas, which river, although rising hereabouts so close to the Indian Ocean, runs eastward into the Chumbul, and this into the Jumna, the latter uniting with the Ganges, so that the watershed for the Bay of Bengal, little as one would suspect it, is really here. Strings of camels were perpetually traversing the sandy track, entering and leaving the town—which is one of the dustiest places to be seen—governed by a Mohammedan Diwan. His ancestors are splendidly buried in a series of marble tombs outside the city gates, and the Palanpur masons were busy, when we visited these monuments, constructing one of especial magnificence for the present ruler's father, Jewahir Khan. It will cost fifteen thousand pounds when completed, and is to be of the same artistic character as the white marble mosques and rozahs at Ahmedabad, having similarly delicate fluted columns, arabesqued and diapered panels, and pierced screens or windows. It was strange to watch the native masons squatted under the neem trees in the burial-ground, chipping out from the pure marble, with no guide except their natural taste and traditional designs, the involved patterns of the capitals and the tracing of the perforated screens.

Next morning, a walk in the jungle, gun in hand, with my kinsman—who, by the way, proved an excellent shot—gave me a good idea of the rural look of this portion of Guzerat. The cultivated ground was covered with cotton just coming into pod, with maize and millet ripening, and pulse of various kinds growing vigorously. The baubul, or "camel-thorn," seemed the most common tree; but mangoes and peepuls also occurred in groves, tenanted by large families of the Hanuman monkey. Nothing can be more amusing than the maternal solitudes of the she-apes. Disturbed by our dogs, a large band of the "four-handed people" crossed the nullah from one clump of trees to another, a mother-monkey among them, with two babies, which clung to her furry sides, leaping down some fourteen or sixteen feet to the ground, and then bounding up to a branch at least as high, without in the least displacing the comical little offspring holding on to their long-tailed parent. Quails—the grey and red variety—were plentiful in the patches of grass, and hares broke constantly from the cactus-hedges. In the grey light of the dum-i-gurg, or "wolf's brush"—that dim gleam which comes before the true dawn—jackals were to be seen stealing home from their nocturnal forage, and the rising sun shone on the far-off backs of a herd of antelopes. A green round little gourd, which the natives called kalungera, covered the open spaces with its creeping stems, and our shikaries gathered the pretty small globes for eating with their curries. The sandy soil was full of the burrows of the kangaroo-rat, a kind of jerboa abundant hereabouts, but very shy. This Hurra, the "Gerbillus Indicus," is the prettiest of field-rats, fawn-coloured, and with lovely large eyes; immensely prolific, littering fifteen to twenty at a birth, and living in societies, which are sadly decimated by the snakes, foxes, and owls.

The English dogs with us had become too wise to hunt these nimble creatures, as they disappear into the earth in the twinkling of an eye, and have a hundred underground runs, ending in neat little chambers, nicely lined with grass and leaves. Two of our friend's little pack had just perished by a snake-adventure. The dogs found a Daboia elegans, or "Russell's viper," under a milk-bush, and tore it to pieces, but not before the venomous reptile had bitten a couple of them in the tongues. While the terriers were still playing with their mangled prey, these two suddenly fell to the ground with eyes fixed and staring coats, and were dead within twenty minutes.

I shall not easily forget the charm of that dawn, and of the pleasant tramp across country beyond the Deesa Road. I did not draw a trigger myself, having a rifle, and being ready only for deer or a wolf. But the glory of the daybreak on the plains and hills; the sweetness of the cool air; the countless objects of interest in the field and forest; the going forth of the birds and beasts to the pursuits of the light, and the sense of the pleasure of life, filled us full. We encountered, as I remarked, all the eight things which make a day lucky for Hindus, namely, a brindled cow, a still pool, the sun, a rich person, a prince, a priest, a giver of rice, and a beautiful woman. The people, too, were so happy. In the dust at the door of the peasants' huts the small brown children, "mother-naked," crouched in groups, gravely playing ekee-dókee—"odd and even." Inside the huts the "two women" were "grinding at the mill," preparing the meal for the day, with the accompaniment of soft and pleasing songs. Villagers, on their way to work, stopped to prostrate themselves before the reddened Lingam-stone, or the marble Bull of Shiva, enshrined under the fig-trees; and deposited there a bright flower or two, a sweetmeat, or a nut. The pilgrims with their bhugwa or salmon-coloured flags, passed over the field-path on their march to the holy places of Siddhpur. The noise of the water-wheels, and the creaking of the ox-carts, mingled with the cry of parrots and the "cheep" of the sand-grouse coming for their early draught and bath to the pools. The beautiful morning of India in the "cold weather" made even the sandy flats of Palanpur picturesque, and lighted up in the distance the massive and majestic peaks of the isolated range of Mount Abu.

In the afternoon, on the way to Jeypore, we passed close under those same grand masses of mountain, rising from the teak and acacia jungle of Sirohi; a rocky isolated highland region, four or five thousand feet in altitude and fifty miles in circumference. Time and our arrangements forbade an inspection of the splendid Jain Temples at Dilwara on the middle eminence, which are, perhaps, the most remarkable of their kind in India. They are said to have cost eighteen million pounds, and to have occupied fourteen years in building. Mount Abu is the sanatorium for all this region of Guzerat and Rajputana, and easy roads take the weary or sick Anglo-Indian to the Nakhi Talao, 4000 feet above the burning plains, where he finds the climate of an English October. The wooded slopes and tangled jungles of these great ramparts of rock are full of bears, panthers, and tigers; but such "fearful wild fowl" keep close to their own haunts, and the paths through the beautiful forests at the mountain foot are unconcernedly traversed by women and children, wearing the white and yellow jasmine and wild roses in their hair, and by cowherds tending large droves of diverse-coloured cattle.

I venture to quote the subjoined description of the lonely glens which open above these densely-timbered lowlands. "No human form appears to disturb the charm of the enchanting solitude, except perhaps the grave figure of some Rajput cavalier, a pilgrim to Ambâjî, who, with shield at his back and spear swaying on his shoulder, fills the vista of a long and narrow gorge, in which a handful of stout hearts might stand against a host; or a group of quiet grain-carriers, with piled-up sacks and grazing cattle, occupying some lovely wild spot in the heart of the defile, where the crystal stream expands into a little turf-bordered pool. By and by the hills slope away into a level valley, which, though more or less sandy, exhibits many fertile spots, producing abundant crops of grain, with little villages here and there, and rivulets flowing from the mountains that in the distance raise, in front and rear, their gigantic forms. Majestic Abu, shrouded in its cloak of mist, is now well seen, its varying outline filling the imagination with a thousand suggestive thoughts. A near view is at last obtained of its precipitous face; its dark recesses lined with forest and underwood, and streaked with many a silver stream; its diverging shoulders pushed majestically forwards in their garb of sable, variegated, as the sun rises towards his meridian, with tints of brightest gold." We look, while passing, upon this fine scenery, and, now and again—as the train rattles through the thickets, or crosses a nullah fringed with wild vines and the perfumed oleander—peacocks and peahens fly up in families from the undergrowth and perch upon the red and white rocks. The ballast of the railway hereabouts is all of broken marble, and the little knolls on either side of the line are solid masses of the same glistening material. As we quit the precincts of the great mountainous oasis the country sinks again into flat and open plains, covered with cotton, grain and poppy, and very thinly populated. One observes Rajputs riding lean cat-hammered horses, bearing swords, guns, and circular shields, with coloured cloth and brass ornamentation. The black buck in this land have grown so accustomed to the locomotive that they stand in herds amid the jowari, and gaze unheeding at the passing carriages. The saras—a red-headed crane—fishes in every pool; and the Indian bird-boy, perched upon the machan, or platform of grass, reared in the bajri field, yells and slings stones with energy at the crowds of mynas and parroquets which circle about his grain. As evening falls, the chakurs—the partridge which by Hindu accounts feeds upon the moonbeams, and never has but one mate—comes forth with its plaintive love-call; and the titwees fly down the nullah-beds, with their strange cry of “did-you-do-it;” while little sparks of fire seen in the jungle show where wayfarers have pitched their camp. The sun sinks in a glory of crimson, amber, and purple behind the peaks of Abu, and we must be content to pass the famous city of Ajmere, with Taragurh, the “Hill of the Stars,” and the Ana-Sagar lake; catching merely such brief glimpses as moonlight can give, being due to arrive in the early morning at Jeypore. Those curious in book-lore, and the economical generally, will like to be reminded that old Thomas Coryat, the traveller of the seventeenth century, walked from Jerusalem to Ajmere; and expended only fifty shillings upon the road!

X.

THE CITY OF VICTORY.

IF the country around Delhi and along the banks of the Jumna must be called the classic district of India, Rajputana is her land of romance and chivalry—the region where Nature, Art, and a high-bred race of warriors have combined to render every aspect of the province attractive. The mountain-mass of Abu prepares the traveller for the change which he will experience in passing from the flat verdure of Guzerat to the highland valleys of Jeypore, Ulwur, Oodeypore, Jodhpore, and the other Rajput States. And here we are arrived in an India different in many and marked ways from the British Indian provinces. The Central Districts and Rajputana, with the Sikh States and Bahawulpore, form a still independent moiety of the Peninsula, where old native manners and customs hold sway, and where one may partly see, in a popular life more picturesque, but less organised and ordered, what the country was and would be without English domination. Rajputana is especially interesting in this regard. It is the land “of the king’s children,” of those proud and warlike people the commonest among whom claims royal descent, and bears himself like a soldier and a prince. A poor Rajput yeoman holds himself as good a gentleman as the richest zemindar of Bengal or the North-West. He calls his king Bapji, "my father," and in many a point of social and personal etiquette preserves quite as lordly a demeanour. In the clan all are peers and brothers, and marriages within it are regarded as incestuous; hence that terrible crime of female infanticide, which stains and shames the pride of the Rajput, who was wont to kill his daughter rather than make for her a mésalliance, or let her remain unmarried. In 1871 the Rajput population of Oudh showed 250,849 males living above ten years of age to only 184,623 females. The sin of infanticide had then well-nigh ceased—and is now practically unknown—but those figures are the monument of countless domestic murders.

As one draws nigh the long vale in which the city of Jeypore is embosomed, ranges of hills rise abruptly from the level fields, sharply ridged, and deeply cloven with glens and hollows. Some are bare and rugged, some are clad with thickets of light-green bush and belts of yellow grass to the summits. Streams wander downwards from their sides, which in the wet season lace the precipices with picturesque waterfalls, and fill the nullahs to their brims; but are now slowly-gliding and slender dribblets of water. Upon the plains through which they wind, antelopes roam in herds, constantly visible from the passing train; and the red-headed crane stalks about. The peacock, sacred to gods and men, spreads his jewelled train upon every village wall, and forages unmolested with his seraglio of peahens in every patch of cultivation. The little villages; the fields divided by mud-banks, topped with tiger-grass; the slinger upon the machan frightening away the parrots from the grain; the wandering caravans of traders; the lonely Rajput rider with his round shield and lance; the dark-eyed, graceful women, and the fearless-looking, handsome men, are all much as they stand described in the ancient writings. For Rajputana is measurelessly old. The bluest blood of Europe is but of yesterday compared with that of the haughty families of this region. The five great Pandu Brothers of the Mahâbhârata were Rajputs, and wandered over the face of these dry plains and marbled hills. The first ancestor of the Rajput kings ruling these valleys was the Sun himself, who was the father of Rama Chundra, the hero of the Ramâyana, and an incarnation of Vishnu. The princes whom we shall visit hereabouts call themselves, and are familiarly styled, Surya-vansa, the "Children of the Sun." The unbroken pedigree of the Maharaja of Jeypore goes back through one hundred and thirty-nine names to Kusa, who was the second son of Rama. Even the haughty Emperor of Delhi bestowed on Jey Singh, the renowned astronomer, king of this land, the title Sivai, meaning "one and a quarter"—still borne by Jeypore princes—as if these immemorial Houses of Rajputana, and their lords, exceeded by a fourth the standard of human pride and prowess. It was esteemed an extraordinary condescension when a Rajput princess espoused a Great Mogul in the zenith of his power ; but, alas ! this, too,—as has been remarked—was the cruel land where, for ages, the female children of the great Thakoors were killed at their birth with poison from the milk-bush put on the breast of the nurse, because husbands high enough in rank could nowhere be found for them.

Of the martial qualities of the race Indian annals are so full that whole Iliads of stirring verse could be written about the daring deeds and boundless loyalty of the Rajput clansmen. It was at Chittor, near Oodeypore, in these same highlands, that fifteen thousand Rajput women committed the johur, or wholesale suicide, to save their honour. And when Dulhai Rao promised the front post in all future battles to the Rajput chief who should first enter a certain besieged town, the leader of one clan was found in the hour of victory impaled upon the elephant spikes at its north gate, and the dead body of another was flung by his own men over the battlements at the south side, so eager were those dauntless Rajputs, or “king’s children,” to sustain their name and to conquer or die for the Surya-vansa. I had myself put into verse a touching story of Rajput fidelity which I twice recited in India among the “king’s children,” and on each occasion with the effect of awakening an extraordinary emotion of patriotism and satisfaction. I shall venture to insert it here for the light it throws on the loyalty and devotion of the people of the region :

"A RAJPÛT NURSE."

"Whose tomb have they builded, Vittoo ! under this tamarind tree, With its door of the rose-veined marble, and white dome, stately to see ;
 Was he holy Brahman, or Yogi, or Chief of the Rajpût line, Whose urn rests here by the river, in the shade of the beautiful shrine ?"

"May it please you," quoth Vittoo, salaaming, "Protector of all the poor !
 It was not for holy Brahman they carved that delicate door ;
 Nor for Yogi, nor Rajpût Rana, built they this gem of our land ;
 But to tell of a Rajpût woman, as long as the stones should stand.

"Her name was Môtî, the pearl-name ; 'twas far in the ancient times,
 But her moon-like face and her teeth of pearl are sung of still in our rhymes ;
 And because she was young, and comely, and of good repute, and had laid
 A babe in the arms of her husband,* the Palace-Nurse she was made.

"For the sweet chief-queen of the Rana in Jeypore city had died, Leaving a motherless infant, the heir to that race of pride ;
 The heir of the peacock-banner, of the five-coloured flag, of the throne
 Which traces its record of glory from days when it ruled alone ;

"From times when, forth from the sunlight,† the first of our kings came down
 And had the Earth for his footstool, and wore the Stars for his crown,

---

* A Hindu father acknowledges paternity by receiving in his arms his new-born child.

† The Rajpût dynasty is said to be descended from the sun.

As all good Rajpûts have told us ; so Môtî was proud and true,
With the Prince of the land on her bosom, and her own brown baby too.

“ And the Rajpût women will have it (I know not, myself, of these things)

As the two babes lay on her bosom, her lord's and the Jeypore king's,

So loyal was the blood of her body, so fast the faith of her heart,
It passed to her new-born infant, who took of her trust its part.

“ He would not suck of the breast-milk till the Prince had drunken his fill ;

He would not sleep to the cradle-song till the Prince was lulled and still ;

And he lay at night with his small arms clasped round the Rana's child,

As if those hands like the rose-leaf could guard him from treason wild.

“ For treason was wild in the country, and villainous men had sought

The life of the heir of the Gadi,* to the Palace in secret brought ;
With bribes to the base, and with knife-thrusts for the faithful, they made their way

Through the line of the guards, and the gateways, to the hall where the women lay.

“ There Môtî, the foster-mother, sate singing the children to rest,
Her baby at play on her crossed knees, and the King's son held to her breast ;

And the dark slave-maidens round her beat low on the cymbal-skin,

Keeping the time of her soft song—when, Saheb !—there hurried in

“ A breathless watcher, who whispered, with horror in eyes and face :

‘ Oh ! Môtî ! men come to murder my Lord the Prince in this place !

---

* The “ seat ” or throne.

They have bought the help of the gate-guards, or slaughtered them unawares,

Hark! that is the noise of their tulwars,* the clatter upon the stairs!

“For one breath she caught her baby from her lap to her heart;
and let

The King’s child sink from her bosom, with lips still clinging and wet;

Then tore from the Prince his head-cloth, and the putta of pearls from his waist,

And bound the belt on her infant, and the cap on his brows, in haste;

“And laid her own dear offspring, her flesh and blood, on the floor,
With the girdle of pearls around him, and the cap that the King’s son wore;

While close to her heart, which was breaking, she folded the Rajah’s joy,

And—even as the murderers lifted the purdah—she fled with his boy.

“But there (so they deemed) in his jewels, lay the Chota Rana,† the Heir,

‘The cow with two calves has escaped us,’ cried one, ‘it is right and fair

She should save her own butcha; ‡ no matter! the edge of the dagger ends

This spark of Lord Raghoba’s sun-light; stab thrice and four times, O friends!’

“And the Rajpût women will have it (I know not if this can be so)
That Môtî’s son in the putta and golden cap cooed low

When the sharp blades met in his small heart, with never one moan or wince,

But died with a babe’s light laughter, because he died for his Prince.

“Thereby did that Rajpût mother preserve the line of our kings.”

“Oh! Vittoo,” I said, “but they gave her much gold and beautiful things,

* Indian swords.

† The “little king.”

‡ “Little one.”

And garments, and land for her people, and a home in the palace!
 May be
 She had grown to love that Princeling even more than the child on her knee."

"May it please the Presence!" quoth Vittoo, "it seemeth not so! they gave
 The gold and the garments and jewels, as much as the proudest would have;
 But the same night deep in her bosom she buried a knife, and smiled, Saying this, "I have saved my Rana! I must go to suckle my child!"

Were the capital of such a land of the ordinary Indian type it would be interesting, but Jeypore is a city that might be built in the fantastic architecture of dreams, or fabled by some poet devising strange and unparalleled combinations of colour and outline. There is nothing like it in India or the world; and, albeit, not at all ancient—for the present metropolis was founded by Jey Singh in 1728—it no doubt reproduces many traditional features of the old times, and well suits the romantic chronicles of the country by its extraordinary beauty of aspect and site. Nothing, however, reveals the character of the place to the traveller as he alights at the railway station and drives to his temporary quarters. The rose-red city of Jeypore, with its beautiful streets and fairy-like palaces, is shut within the fence of high seven-gated walls, just as the Rajput ladies of proud degree are screened from view by latticed windows and jealous portals. But you turn suddenly from the open space before, say, the Amber Gateway, where camels are loading, and ox-carts toiling along, and mean mud-built hovels cluster close to the tall screen-walls, protecting and concealing the real entrance. Your carriage crosses the square, beneath the crenulated breastwork; rattles over the pavement of the guard-house, where the Rajput sentry, in long black cloak and red turban, salutes the vehicle of the Maharaja, and suddenly there opens on the well-pleased but astonished gaze the vista of a busy thoroughfare wholly unique and beautiful; in general effect, indeed, almost beyond description. The entire city from this first point of view is of one and the same tint—a delicate rosy red, relieved with white. If a conqueror could dream of building a capital with rouge-royal marble or pink coral, this is how it would look! It is an interminable perspective of roseate house-fronts, bathed by soft sunlight, nowhere ungraceful in style of building, and at many spots on either side of the way broken magnificently by stately fronts of palaces, and long lines of light pavilions, embellished with columns and cupolas, and enriched with floral or pictorial frescoes in all sorts of designs. The splendid street, thus entered, runs on a perfect level from east to west, more than two miles, always of the same grand breadth of one hundred and eleven feet, and so absolutely straight that throughout its entire length each house, each palace, each trader's shop, can be seen on either side, fading away in the long perspective of rose-red to the battlements of the far-off Manek, or Ruby Gate. A gay and bustling crowd of citizens gives animation to the charming mise en scene, which is backed by mountains, rising nobly to the pure blue sky, almost every peak of them covered with some commanding fort or fantastic pleasure-house. Two main roadways, of the same rosy colour from end to end, and each of them as wide as the great central street, cross it at right angles, forming at the points of bisection two spacious piazzas, called the "Amber Chauk," and the "Ruby Chauk." These subordinate thoroughfares are each a mile and a quarter long, and have the same picturesque roseate lines of dwellings and shops, broken in a similar fashion by buildings of the strangest fancy and most elaborate ornamentation.

It is true that the lovely pink flush which thus clothes the entire visible city is only a wash of colour laid upon the chunam with which the rough masonry of the structures has been covered, but it beautifies the face of the capital almost as much as if Jeypore were really constructed of rose-tinted alabaster; and now and again one comes upon an edifice which is of the same prevailing hue, but architecturally important and remarkable. • Such is the "Girls' School," established in the stately house of Nattani, a former Minister of the State; the "School of Art," where young Jeypore artisans work at the enamelling, the carving, the metal trades, hereafter to be spoken of; and some of the town residences of the Rajput Thakoors near the Chandpol, the "Gate of the Moon." All the north side of the great street between the two squares is occupied by an enormous and astonishing palace, which covers, with its gardens and zenanas, a seventh portion of the entire city. There is a tall roseate tower here, called the Istri Lat: a roseate triple gateway, surmounted by a Nakâr-Khana, or Drum House; and a museum, all in rose colour. The grand entrance to the palace, the Siran Déorhi—also in rose colour and white marble—faces the “Maharajah’s College,” an arcaded building of the Hindu-Saracenic type, of the same soft hue; and near this rises from the busy street an edifice called the Hawa Mahal, or “Hall of the Winds,” a vision of daring and dainty loveliness, nine stories of rosy masonry and delicate overhanging balconies and latticed windows, soaring with tier after tier of fanciful architecture in a pyramidal form, a very mountain of airy and audacious beauty, through the thousand pierced screens and gilded arches of which the Indian air blows cool over the flat roofs of the very highest houses. Aladdin’s magician could have called into existence no more marvellous abode, nor was the pearl and silver palace of the Peri Banou more delicately charming.

On the dawn-lit hills above hangs a temple of the Sun, looking down into the Gulta, a deep pass through the hills filled with shrines and fountains; and if you drive through the rosy street which opens opposite the Tripolia, the Indianesque manner of it all is well maintained by a low, one-storied building, containing a row of strongly-barred cages. Here, full upon the open square, as if it were part of the natural appurtenances of a Rajput capital, are confined eight man-eating tigers, criminals of the neighbouring jungles and hills, taken "red-handed," and imprisoned as State captives. The huge brindled beasts crouch at the bars, savagely glaring forth upon the moving crowds outside, too busy with pleasure and traffic to notice them. Each tiger has tasted deep of human blood—one monstrous brute, lying in the hot sunlight on his back, has devoured seven, another ten human beings, and the tigress growling in the last den is declared by her custodian to be known to have slaughtered and consumed fifteen men, women, and children. Most of such malefactors would elsewhere be shot, but these, after much vengeful patience, have been snared in pitfalls, where the tiger is left until hunger has reduced him to extreme weakness, upon which the captors manage to draw him forth, and shut him up in a life-long imprisonment.

We were the guests at Jeypore of Surgeon-Major Hendley, M.R.A.S., an officer of high and varied accomplishments, to whom the Government of India, as well as Indian art and the sciences in general, owe a very deep debt. Not only does this gentleman, as agency surgeon, superintend the hospitals and dispensaries of the State—more than twenty in number—extending the benefit of the best medicine and surgery to nearly ninety thousand patients in the past year, but he supervises a first-class observatory established near his residence, wherein the automatic meteorograph of Van Rysselberghe—a marvellous instrument, and the only one of the kind now in use throughout the British Empire—has been set at work by his assiduity. Dr. Hendley has, further, gathered into the museum an interesting and valuable collection of objects illustrating Indian arts, industries, and antiquities. Here are textiles, carpets, sculptures, coins, brass work, pottery, lacquer, carvings, glass, enamelling, jewellery, and natural products, which have been visited by over a million natives since its opening in 1881. At the Albert Hall, in the public gardens given to his people by the late Maharaja, this energetic Doctor, in alliance with Colonel Jacob, had concentrated all the articles intended for the South Kensington Exhibition; and we studied with an admiration which will soon be shared by thousands in London, the beautiful carved teak nakâr-khana, the delicate models, and the rich sample of works in marble, plaster, glass, metal, and exquisite enamels which Jeypore has sent to England. In another part of the "Albert Hall" Dr. Hendley had bands of native artificers busy at their various crafts. The wood-carvers were squatting round large beams and planks of teak, finishing the panels for the Kensington screen; and, while all exhibited great dexterity and artistic gifts, it was positively wonderful to watch one boy of fourteen years from Shekrawati, whose nimble chisel and unerring mallet seemed to make the pattern leap, as it were, alive from the hard wood. He was receiving a man's pay, and seemed to be the pride and favourite of his fellow-artisans. Close by, some Jeypore ardish-wallas were busy in preparing those fantastic but effective panels of plaster and glass, which are here used to decorate the interiors of palaces and mansions. The artist lays little pieces of mirror on a bed of the material, covers these with a sheet of the plaster, and then cuts down through the ardish to the glass, elaborately chasing the plaster into patterns where it borders the glass. The effect is as if white marble and polished silver had been blended, and in the gleam of lamps or torches nothing could seem more softly resplendent.

Other Jeypore workmen were inlaying coloured glass in the same way between thick slabs of plaster, and cutting down from both faces to the glass, which then shines forth from the deep intaglio like jewel-work. Dr. Hendley has published a description of these indigenous crafts, and of the manner in which the son acquires them from the father, perpetuating from generation to generation that admirable precision and feeling of pure native art which will be acknowledged by all good judges. He writes of such a boy as the young wood-carver alluded to: "In his very earliest days he probably played by the side of his father as he carved, while his mother was engaged in some domestic occupation close by, or worked as a cooly near her husband. As soon as he could hold a piece of charcoal he would have begun to draw outlines on a board, sketching and re-sketching, it might be the features of Gunesh, the Elephant-headed God of Wisdom, who should be invoked at the beginning of all labour; or perhaps a flower. In time, without conscious effort and with a keen sense of pleasure, he could draw these objects with his eyes shut. Hand and eye insensibly acquired power and precision, so that his art became a part of his nature at the time when his mind was most impressionable and his fingers most capable of acting in unison with it. From drawing he advanced to coarse carving of window or door frames or spinning-wheels; and when intrusted with finer work he copied the designs of his father and his friends; and, perhaps, when he attains manhood, he will one day hit upon a new design which may be liked by the craft and be imitated, and so become a permanent addition to the number of grand traditional patterns which represent the experience and sense of the beautiful of all ages."

Guided and instructed by this kind friend, all the gates in Jeypore were thrown open for us, and even at the third portal of the Great Palace, where every Jeypore citizen must go on foot, our carriage was allowed to proceed. At its second gate a great square is entered, with marble pavilions and chabootras in the centre, and on one side the painted lattices of the zenana, on the other a temple of Vraj Raj, or Krishna, and the astronomical observatory of the famous Jey Singh, who founded the modern city. This Jeypore Observatory is the largest of five, which were erected here and at Delhi, Mathura, Benares, and Ujain, by Maharaja Sawai Jey Singh, early in the eighteenth century. He founded Jeypore in A.D. 1728 and died in 1743, reformed the calendar for the Emperor, established the obliquity of the ecliptic and the position of the equinox, and patronised art and learning of all kinds, besides taking a very prominent part in the political events of his time. Before his days the instruments employed by Eastern astronomers were of brass, and on too small a scale for accuracy; hence the construction of these enormous edifices of masonry, which tower on all sides in quaint shapes of stone and metal, the huge Nariol, or sun-dial; the Druv Nal, or pointer to the North Pole; the Yantr Samrat, "King of Dials," whose gnomon is one hundred and eighty-nine feet high, registering the true sun time; the Chakra Yantr, or Brazen Circles, to determine the declination of the stars; and a variety of other ancient and mysterious appliances. Passing by the great astronomical court and threading next a wilderness of marvellous archways and fanciful architectures, the grand entrance of the palace, the Siran Deorhi, is now attained, beyond which stands, in another splendid square, the Hall of the Nobles, girdled with marble columns, and the Diwan-i-Am, or hall of public audience.

A small gate to the west next brings you to the Chanda Mahal, or "Silver House," the heart and marvel of all this immense abode. Seven stories of such wild and lovely structure as you would expect to see only in dreams rise here one above the other in rose-red and snowy-white balconies, oriels, arches, pilasters, lattices, and domes—gay everywhere with frescoes and floral ornaments. In the lowest floor, which is kept—like the second and third—as a winter residence, we are permitted to inspect a priceless volume, the abstract of the Mahâbhârata in Persian, made by the orders of Akbar the Great at a cost of forty thousand pounds, and illustrated in the most exquisite manner with coloured and gilded miniature pictures, all of an incredible delicacy. The Shobha Newas, one floor above, is full of strange paintings on the wall, and arcades embellished with gorgeous shells of copper, silver, and foil. Next we ascend to the Chhabi Newas, or “Hall of Splendour,” shining with polished marbles, and coloured enamelling. Above this is the Shish Mahal, the pavilion of glass, with endless patterns wrought in little mirrors let into carved plaster-work; and above that we step forth upon the Mokt, or “Crown” of the palace, where the vast flat roof is encircled with shady alcoves and open chambers, vaulted by graceful curved cupolas. Beneath lie the green palace-gardens, full of pomegranates, palms, and bananas; and beyond, the spread of the countless busy streets and lanes, girdled by the walls, and overhung by the encircling hills, topped with forts and temples. It is vain to attempt any description of that enchanting prospect of royal pavilions, busy streets, beautiful gardens, and green country-sides, more novel and absorbing than any other which India herself can offer. Nature and man have here allied themselves to produce the most perfect and lovely landscape conceivable. In green and gold, in rose-colour and white, in distant dim blues and greys, the pleasaunces and the city and the far-off walls and mountain ridges of Ambêr group together at our feet, a picture to delight the eye and feast the mind. How should words reproduce Govinda's temple, between the upper and lower gardens; the snow-white sides of the Badal Mahal, or "Cloud Palace," on the edge of the lake; the dark ramparts of the fortress in the mountains; and those long lines of rose-red streets which intersect Jeypore? To complete the rich artistic ensemble of the scene, a feast is being given to Brahman men and women on one of the many flat roofs of the Upper Palace, and attendants go about bearing the Maharajah's bounty, in the form of cakes and sweetmeats, amid some three hundred or four hundred men and women clad in holiday dresses of crimson and purple, saffron and blue, glittering like flowers in the sun; now shining upon the "City of Victory," as if its people were indeed his children. Whoever has viewed that prospect from the palace-roof of Jeypore has seen "India of the Rajas" in her inmost grace and beauty.

We had before this received and returned the visit of the Minister, the Baboo Kanta Chund, and were to have the honour of an interview with the Maharajah himself at his hunting lodge, three miles from the city. Sawai Madho Sing, successor of Ram Sing, and thirty-fifth Maharajah of Jeypore, is a comely and rather portly young prince, who speaks only Hindustani, and dearly loves the pleasures of the chase. We found him but just returned from an expedition

—wherein he had killed two wild boars and three or four black buck—surrounded by a variety of English dogs, and with some fine Arab horses picketed in his courtyard. He may be said, in a sense, to owe his throne to Dr. Hendley; and certainly Jeypore is indebted to this good doctor for the tranquillity with which the succession was accomplished. It was our friend who, acting at once as Palace Adviser and Resident, induced Ram Sing to name an heir before all the Thakoors, and took the necessary measures in order that the old king's latest desire should be known and obeyed. The present Maharajah is a faithful friend of his benefactor, and very kind to all English visitors. We talked of Jeypore, of sport, of Rajput history, and of the wonders of London; and then, after ordering us elephants for our trip to Ambêr, the Prince courteously decked our necks and wrists with the usual garlands of flowers; sprinkled attar upon our nosegays with his own hand; and bade us farewell, with many gracious compliments and good wishes.

Ambêr—the name is an appellation of the god Shiva—lies north-east of Jeypore, and about eight miles distant. It is the ancient capital of the district, and was taken from the Meenas and made a city in the middle of the twelfth century. It lies beyond a ridge, dividing the two valleys, under steep and rocky eminences covered with jungle, where tigers may frequently be found. Our elephants, gaily caparisoned, and with their heads and trunks painted in curious patterns, rolled us gravely down the rosy street, out at the Zorawar-Singh gate, whereon the five-hued flag of Jeypore—the panch-rung—was flying, and so past the mansion of the Thakoor of Chomu, the chief of the Rajput nobles, whose acquaintance we had afterwards the pleasure of making. Then the great beasts took us through the edge of a swamp, covered with water-fowl; along a road bordered with garden houses; and thence to a point beyond one of Akbar's kos minars, or "Delhi milestones," where the hills drew together, and a gateway spanned the narrowed road. Here, at a temple of Mahadeo, the eye beholds the strange spectacle on one side of a great populous city in full vitality; on the other of a city dead and silent, nine-tenths of its stone-built dwellings tumbled and ruined as though by an earthquake, wild weeds growing over its mansions and temples, and the ancient streets choked with wild fig-trees and broken blocks of carved marble and sandstone. Some hundreds of Brahmans still loiter about the least dilapidated abodes, and there is a little bazaar; but otherwise the only inhabited edifices left in Ambêr are the fort, the palace, and one or two temples. In the midst of these silent ruins sleeps a large lake, full of amphibious snakes and alligators, and with a water poisonous and stagnant, but reflecting every tree, building, and rocky promontory as if in a mirror. Along its noiseless borders our elephants tramp, passing the deserted pleasure-garden of Mohursbari, and grey decayed shrines, where the very gods seem to be grown mouldy, and the rains of many generations have dismally blackened the white bulls of Shiva. At the end of the lake the road turns upward to the great shining palace on the ridge, leading through three massive gateways with spiked doors, the last of which admits us to a spacious square in front of the main entrance.

PALACE AT AMBÈR, JEYPORE.

Now, in a moment, the scene is changed from ruin to magnificence. A rich nakâr-khana, with brass doorways and alcoves of embroidered marble, opens the way into a second courtyard, paved with white and red stone, and surrounded by the most graceful buildings imaginable. One is the Diwan-i-Khas, a pavilion formed by columns of white marble and red sandstone, its inner walls of laced and pierced stonework, and its roof delicately embellished with colour. On another face of this "Court of Honour" rises magnificently the Gateway of the Mardana, or "Men's Abode," which has been pronounced the finest portal in the world. It is in truth too lovely in tints, material, artistic labour, and ensemble to be described—a matchless portico, such as might provide the door to Paradise. Through this you reach, across a green and cool garden, the Jey Mandir, or "Hall of Victory," adorned by panels of alabaster, inlaid with birds, flowers, and arabesques in various colours, the roof glittering with the mirrored and spangled work for which Jeypore art is renowned. There are bathing-rooms here, all of pale, creamy marble, looking forth upon the dead city and the fair valley through screens of fretted stone; chambers painted with curious pictures of towns, temples, and hunting or mythological scenes; and one beautiful apartment entirely lined with plates of mica let into the white walls and vaultings, between lines and floriated ornaments of grey, the effect being as though this royal retreat were filled with moonlight. Then we traverse the tiny but elegant chambers of the zenana—for the palace is at present empty—shut from the world by a jealously high wall, in which pierced lattices permit the imprisoned ladies to gaze upon the world without. There is a delicious little pavilion above this, on the roof of the great gate, styled Sohag Mandir, from which those secluded princesses could watch the Durbars in the square of the Diwan-i-Khas; and over the "Hall of Victory" is built a Jas Mandir, or "Alcove of Light," which literally glows with bright and tender colours and exquisite inlaid work, and looks through arches of carved alabaster and clusters of slender columns upon the sleeping lake and the silent mountains. If this portion of the palace must be regarded as a prison it is the most beautiful gaol imaginable; and the grey old Rajput in charge explains that when the Maharaja's Court is here the men are sometimes all excluded, and the princesses have the run of the entire edifice.

Yet the palace is not quite empty even to-day. At the side of the main entrance beneath the ramp exists a temple dedicated to Devi, and here it is the custom every morning in the year to sacrifice an animal. At the Durga festival a whole herd of buffaloes and a flock of sheep are offered to the dread goddess, but the daily tribute is a goat, which replaces, it is said, the human victim whose life used to be taken every morning in this gloomy fane before the times of our British Râj. It chanced that we entered the temple just at the hour of sacrifice, and, although the ladies would by no means view the sanguinary ceremony, a brief conversation with the attendants induced them to admit Dr. Hendley and myself to the presence of the goddess. She sate—the awful blood-loving Kali—all black and red, upon a platform inside the darkest part of the adytum of the temple, with eyes of glittering mother-o'-pearl and a necklace of skulls. At the foot of the platform was a heap of sand, and near it some wide-mouthed brass vessels, and a broad heavy-bladed sword. A Rajput was worshipping in the corner, and the priest with two assistants moved grimly about, arranging for the matutinal rite. The victim, a black goat, stood placidly enough upon the heap of sand, sniffing curiously at the edge of the stone platform where so many of his predecessors had perished. Suddenly a bell was touched, and the priest took the heavy sword and laid it in front of the image, while he made the “ashtanga” or eight-fold prostration, and repeated the mantra of expiation. Then the two attendants laid hold of the goat quite gently, one steadying it at the tail, and one keeping its head straight with a cord lightly fastened round the neck and ears. The poor animal, quite unalarmed and unconcerned, stood perfectly still, while the priest bared his right shoulder and squared himself athwart-wise ;

the sword, grasped by both hands, balancing under the goat's neck. Abruptly he raised it, swung it back far behind him, and then brought it whistling round with a blow which combined the cut and draw. There was a slight sound, as when a soft stick is chopped; and the blade had shred clean through the goat's neck-bone and neck, so that the boy with the cord caught up the severed head into the air before it could touch the earth. The body of the victim fell sideways, guided by the other attendant, who directed the bleeding arteries into one of the brass vessels. Taking the goat's head, the priest then laid it on the platform, before the glaring eyes of the goddess, and placing his brow on the earth repeated the prayer prescribed. Thus the horrid propitiation ended; but we learned that the priests of the temple, being of a special caste, themselves ate daily five seers of the goat's flesh, and had the right to sell the remainder in the bazaar. The palace pays seventeen rupees monthly to the contractor who supplies these innocent victims. The priest said that the goddess would be very angry if the goat were not decapitated at a single blow, and that he could cut off the head of a buffalo with equal certainty in one attempt.

It is notable how deep-grained this notion of sacrifice is, especially in India. In the villages round Chingleput they give their first-born daughter to the temple to be Deva-Dasa, a dancing-girl, a "handmaid of the god." A good Hindoo, before he eats, breaks off the first morsel for his guardian deity, and credits him in the shop-books with a few cowries daily. Every student has read of the Rajasaya and the Aswamedh, sacrifices upon which kings expended the garnered treasures of their realms. When food, animal or vegetable, is offered to gods, all castes can then partake of it, and many people in Hindustan live regularly by the altar-scrap in this way. Sakya-Muni's teaching did away with the bloody rites of the Brahmanic period, but there are still immolations of a sad kind practised secretly in India. The Bheels, Dhers, and Chamars cast themselves occasionally from lofty rocks near Jawad, hoping to be rajas in the next state of life. In 1877 a Gosain of Benares sacrificed a boy of twelve to Mahadev in order to discover treasure. In 1883 a Banya family of twelve persons committed suicide in unison to "please the gods;" and not long ago, in Northern India, it was not very uncommon—if a debtor could not pay—for his creditor to place a cow or an old woman on the top of a pile of wood and to burn the victim to ashes, the idea being that the terrible sin thus committed would devolve upon the debtor's soul. This was called the "Koor." Up to 1850 human sacrifices were usual among the Kandhs, and a Raja of Bustar, twenty years before, sacrificed twenty-five full-grown men at a shrine of Danteswari near Jagdalpur. But at Jeysulmir, in the siege, 24,000 Rajput women and girls were voluntarily put to death by the ceremony called johur, some by the sword, some by fire; after which their husbands and fathers, with the tulsi-leaf in their turbans, and yellow powder on their faces and garments, went forth to die for their faith. Tantum religio potuit suadere malorum!

On our way back we overtook a funeral procession. The dead man was borne on four bamboos to the burning-ground, which is an open space, covered with pretty domed cenotaphs, and had upon it several pyres lighted and smoking. The bearers chanted Ram, Ram, such hai!—i.e., “Rama is the true God”—and those who followed with the pots of fire and water answered in a constant antiphone, Jo kaha bhao such hai—“What you say, brother, is true!” Under Jaigurh, the “Fort of Victory,” there lies a deep valley, which we subsequently visited, reserved for the monuments of the Maharajahs. Many of these are magnificent buildings of pure white marble, and people may see at South Kensington this year a model in brass by Jeypore artists of the finest cenotaph, that commemorating Jey Singh. The dead city, the dead kings, and the Rajput borne to the burning-ghât, turned our thoughts to the old, unsolved problems, upon some of which the next morning was spent in a very interesting discussion, shared by a Jain jeweller, named Kasinath, and by a Pundit of the agency. This Jain, who maintained that his faith was older than Buddhism—bahut purana mat—was a Digambara, and held that all women must be born in another life as men before they can attain moksha, or release. Immensely wealthy, and still accumulating money, the Jain goldsmith’s eyes were hollow with fasting, and he was acknowledged even by the Pundit—who looked on him as nastika, a heathen—to be an excellent man, and true to the five prohibitions against killing, lying, stealing, adultery, and worldly-mindedness. Kasinath, however, frankly confessed that the second sin was hard to avoid in business; and I heard, indeed, that not long ago some conscientious Jains begged the administration in Jeypore not to plant peepul trees in the gold and silver bazaar, because every Hindu knows that the peepul leaves whisper to Rishabha, or to Yama, every word they hear, and nobody can possibly buy and sell, in a world like ours, with any chance of profit, if a peepul tree is always listening. On the same day we received the visit of the chief noble of Jeypore, the Thakoor Ananda Singh, whose high-bred manners corresponded well with the haughty history of his house, and with his own handsome Rajput face and soldierly carriage. Altogether, Jeypore is one of the most interesting places in India, and we quitted it, rich in abiding recollections, and in new and valued friendships.

There were, however, sad as well as pleasant and beautiful things to see in Jeypore. Dr. Hendley, as has been said, supervises all the hospitals and dispensaries of the city, and to visit these was to learn how well his skill and devotion are appreciated by the Rajputs, as also to know something of the darker side of Indian life. At one hospital—where I called on the way to see again that wonderful copy in Persian of the Mahâbhârata—there was a notable example of Hindu jealousy. It was afforded by a bright-eyed and rather handsome woman, who sate up on one of the beds, wrapped in a chuddur. Her husband had, for good or bad reasons, suspected her fidelity, and, according to her own account, had induced her mother-in-law and aunt to hold her down while he fell upon her with his teeth, lacerating her horribly, and finally biting off the side of her nose. The poor creature laid bare to me her smooth brown back and shoulders, and showed, with indignant exclamations, the marks upon them, which were as if some panther or hyæna had worried her. They were, nevertheless, healing well, and the accomplished doctor had fashioned her an excellent new ala to her nose, which was growing famously when I examined it, and would soon quite restore her appearance, especially with the assistance of the nose-ring. It was satisfactory to hear that the brutal husband was lying fast in prison, and about to be tried for his ferocity. Biting and cutting off noses is only too common a crime in India, under similar circumstances.

XI.

ULWUR TO DELHI.

ULWUR is a Rajput State, 3024 square miles in area, and containing 800,000 inhabitants, of whom the majority are those warlike Meos who used to be the trouble and even terror of the Delhi emperors. There were times when the gates of the great city had to be closed at the "Azán" prayer, after which hour none ventured forth for fear of the Ulwur Meos. They are quiet enough now, under British vigilance and the rule of the young Maharajah Mangal Singh, of the "Bárah Kotri," an intelligent and high-minded prince, who governs excellently. As in other parts of Rajputana, ridges of parallel hills shut in the central and picturesque valley of the province; game is plentiful among the dhauk and sálar jungles, and the two large lakes of Siliserh and Deoṭi, near the capital, swarm with fish and fowl, the latter being also so full of water-snakes that the palace on an island in its midst has become uninhabitable. Alligators, too, occur in these Ulwur pools, and carry off goats, donkeys, and even ponies. Among the trees of the uplands are the khair and tendu, yielding ebony; the simul, a cotton tree, of which the buds are largely eaten by monkeys; and the jiwapot, furnishing rosaries from its berries ; while the plains abound in neem, kikar, or baubul, with fig, tamarind, and jujube, bamboos, and palms. Tigers and panthers roam in the hills, as also sambhur, nilghai, and black buck, as well as the jarah or hyæna, on which the natives say that witches ride, "one hyæna having actually been caught lately with his nose bored for riding-strings." The wild pig is fairly frequent, and after the twelfth year, so the shikâris declare, has a hide which becomes impenetrable to bullets.

There is, moreover, the seh or porcupine—whose quill stuck in a door will make the household quarrel fearfully until it be removed—the sâla or ant-eater, together with foxes, wild cats, badgers, otters, lynxes, flying foxes, and endless monkeys. Peacocks sun themselves everywhere, in town and wilderness ; the little weaver-bird, baiya, swings his bottle-shaped nest in every grove. In almost all parts of India, indeed, one observes the swinging home of this sociable creature, which does not fear man so much as snakes, and chooses a pendulous twig—if possible over water—from which to hang its exquisitely woven abode. Mahouts, however, use the nests to stuff the pads of their elephants. In Ul'wur-land, moreover, two kinds of parrots abound, along with bulbuls, green pigeons, the owl called "King of the Night," the tintori, which chatters when a tiger moves in the grass, the lanklat and bandânî, "which perch upon his head, and pick meat out of his mouth as he sleeps ;" and the kanjan, a little dusky bird, having a black feather in its head, which will render anybody invisible if he carries it. It may be inferred that Ulwur is a good field for wizards, naturalists, and sportsmen. The people have a singular custom when a person of importance enters their towns or villages. The women collect, and begin a song in chorus, the foremost carrying on her head a brass vessel, called the kalas, into which the visitor is expected to drop a rupee. Lady Dufferin, the other day, in entering Ulwur, placed five golden mohurs in the kalas, of which the town still gratefully speaks. The badge of Ulwur is the dagger with a wrist guard, and the chunar tree—the Oriental plane—from which Ram plucked a leaf to place in his turban, when he went to fetch Sita from Ceylon, the Rajputs being descended from Ram and Sita. Of the Ulwur Hindus half follow Shiva and half Vishnu, but the disreputable Shakti sect called Kund or Panth is much on the increase, and performs secret and immoral rites.

The Maharaja, on befitting occasions, keeps great state. On high festivals he is accompanied by the Máhi Marátib, the famous ennobling insignia of “the Fish” received from Delhi; by the images of Sita Ram; by a person supporting a gilded umbrella; people carrying pankhás representing the sun and moon; by mace-bearers, morchal or peacock-plume bearers, chonrí or yak-tail bearers, men wielding curious spears, ballam wálás, carriers of silver tiger-headed clubs, ghota wálás, runners carrying guns, khás bardárs, and ordinary spearmen. Yet, personally he has the simplest tastes imaginable, laughs at all this mediæval frippery, and, next to the solid business of his kingdom, cares for little except good horses and manly sports. The room in the Summer Palace where the Prince of Ulwur administers government is as plain as a bank-parlour, furnished with a few common armchairs and a second-hand writing table, and carpeted with a woollen durry. But it is a "king's room," notwithstanding; for at its window, opening into the garden, the Maharajah receives with his own hand the petitions of all who come, and over the window is inscribed a Persian verse which says:

"Heed thou the sighs of the oppressed! they wait
The tyrant's prayer, and drive it from Heav'n's gate."

In the same palace are diwans and chambers as splendid as anything in India; one especially, called the Shish-Khana, or "Hall of Mirrors," cost £60,000 to decorate, and contains a dining-table of solid silver, having curious moving channels of crystal, where coloured fish seem to dart about. But Mangal Singh administers affairs in the little garden-room, and gives audience in a very plain apartment on the roof, with no adornments except a portrait of Her Majesty the Queen-Empress, and the superb view which it affords over the gardens and the city. He received us, dressed in a Norfolk jacket, linen trousers, stockings, and spring-side boots, his shirt fastened at the neck by a large diamond. We were his guests at Ulwur, and his great solicitude was to know if we were well lodged and provided for. No one could blend better than this Rajput ruler the dignity which belongs to his line and rank with perfect ease and frankness of manner. He had just returned from shooting, of which, as well as of hawking, and hunting with the cheetahs, he is extremely fond. His people adore him for his love of justice and simplicity. The brother of his Diwan—Sri Ram—one of the most accomplished and amiable gentlemen in Rajputana, told us many anecdotes of the Maharajah's devotion to the welfare of his people. Sri Ram himself is a charming little man, with soft voice, the manners of a perfect courtier, gold shoes, snowy turban, and grey coat daintily embroidered.

The city of Ulwur contains about 50,000 inhabitants. It possesses none of the picturesqueness of Jeypore, having narrow unpaved streets, and few buildings of importance. The people, however, are interesting, blending, as they do, many races and castes, and pursuing a great variety of arts and industries. Some of the women—particularly those from the villages—wear the peculiar cloths of yellow and brown or blue and yellow, called phoolkaris, which are inlaid with little circular pieces of looking-glass. In the sunshine they seem, at a distance, as if clothed with gems. In the heart of the city is the Banni Bilas Palace, which commands from a pavilion on its roof a prospect so enchanting, that it may compare with the view from the top of the Royal Residence at Jeypore. The pavilion is of white marble, its roof and walls inlaid with coloured stones, and with that pretty tinsel-work of glass and mother-o'-pearl or mica let into the panels and arches, which sheds the indescribable effect as of soft moonlight already mentioned in describing the Jeypore palaces. The open front of this beautiful apartment gives upon a large tank or lake, surrounded by white marble walls, embellished at every angle with elegant domed kiosks. Behind the lake rise abruptly the steep hills embosoming the city, hills of a rich warm colour, belted with light green vegetation, and crowned with the walls of an ancient fort.

Ulwur is a corruption of Alpur, "the strong city," and the fortress was built in stormy times by the Nikumpa Rajputs; but a woman's righteous anger overthrew its owners. The old system in all these Hindu states was "despotism tempered by assassination." In the case of the Nikumpas, their ruin is attributed to the practice of human sacrifice. Daily they offered to Durga Devi some wretched man or woman belonging to the lower castes. A Domni widow's son was thus put to death, and the Domni, in revenge, told the Khanzada chief of Kotila that he might easily seize the Ulwur fort by attacking it when the Nikumpas were engaged in the worship of Devi, at which time they laid aside their arms. An attack was accordingly organised. A party of Khanzadas lay in wait under the fort; the Domni, at the proper moment, gave the signal by throwing down a basket of ashes, and a successful assault was made. The spot where the ashes were thrown down is still pointed out and called "Domni Danta." You look upon this bright landscape, full of old legend and busy traffic, from balconies of pierced marble—delicious little bowers of carved and fretted embroidery, where the satin polish of the stone, the cool smooth floors, the light filtering through sheeny windows of close and complex patterns, the tinkle of fountains falling on the pavement, the breeze sighing through the feathers of the palm trees, and the broad flags of the banana make up a sense of luxury and graceful life which words cannot convey. Close to the lake is the lovely cenotaph of the Maharajah Bakhtâwar Singh, with foliated arches, copied in marble from the segmental forms which bamboos take when they are tied together for a roof. There is no dead king's spirit which might not be proud of such a tomb, and no artist who would not confess it a perfect subject for his pencil, with the wild peacocks dropping their gorgeous trains down its white walls, and the water reflecting every line and angle of its noble contours.

Inside the palace are a library, an arsenal, and a Tosha-Khana, or Treasure-House. The library is rich in Sanskrit and Persian MSS., which certain skilful scribes were copying. It contains some marvellous illuminated scrolls, some ancient Kurans, and one special copy of the Gulistan, for which it would be almost justifiable to break the last commandment. The book has been valued even by local bibliophiles at £50,000, but is beyond price for the purity of its script, and the splendid colour and delicacy of its pictures. Some one at Ulwur ought to reproduce these beautiful mediæval designs, as Dr. Hendley has popularised at Jeypore those of the Mahâbhârata, executed by order of Akbar the Great. The old Brahman librarian—saluted by me as “Dwijasuttama,” or “Best of the Twice-born”—was so gratified at the epithet, and at a little Sanskrit compliment written in his “name-book,” that he would have detained us all day over his learned treasures. But we passed on to the armoury, where there were hundreds of choice and famous swords, hilted to outdo Excalibar itself in gold; jade, and jewelled work. Some of them had pearls enclosed in a slot within the breadth of the blade, so that the pearls run up and down as the point is raised or depressed, a well-known trick of the old Oriental sword-forgers. The Rajputs have always worshipped the sword—asi—and there are some philologists who pretend to derive the name of Asia from this cult, or from the ancient sacrifice of aswa, the horse. There were shields in the Ulwur armoury of great beauty, some of transparent rhinoceros-hide, studded with gold and jewels; some of nilghai skin, the tuft of hair upon the breast being retained, and made to furnish the tassel of the boss. A shirt of mail worn by Holkar’s grandfather, and a rifle ten feet in length, were shown with special pride by the Maharajah’s armourer, who is the best judge of the water and temper of a sword-blade in Rajputana.

In the tosha-khana were numberless chests of teak bound with iron—containing the surplus funds of Ulwur in rupees and gold mohurs—elephant trappings, gilded saddles and bridles, dresses of honour, costly shawls, and the jewels of the Royal Household. The glories of these latter were exhibited amid a crowd of proud and respectful Rajput guards and attendants. There was a diamond worth £10,000, and two emeralds of prodigious size, with Persian couplets carved upon their lucent green, which might have made any feminine breast glow with passionate desire, not to mention a rope of pearls, for which the seas of Ormuz and of Lanka must have been ransacked. The Tosha-Khana also buys and stores perfumes; and the dark little treasure-chamber was sweet and subtle with all sorts of essences, laid up for State occasions and for the pleasuring of the zenana, in flasks, jars, and little leathern dubbas. Here was the Majmuah—"all the sweetnesses" and Rahat-i-Ruh—"comforts of the soul," with attar, the real rose-scent, a greenish yellow oil, of which a lakh of rose-blooms will only furnish 180 grains. With these, as the palace steward said, an appreciative person might "dimagh mu' attar hona"—"die of a rose, in aromatic pain," and truly those curious in the fine delights of fragrance should procure some of the oil of the Keora palm. It will give a new sensation to the nose. •

Yet the Prince, as has been said, sets but light store by these vanities. He is devoted to horses, and has a splendid breeding stud, comprising some of the best Kattiawar, Arabian, and even English blood. The riding-stallions inhabit a vast range of stabling, where every stall has affixed the name, age, and pedigree of the occupant; while the mares are camped in a still larger enclosure, their colts and fillies running about near them, in a perfect equine paradise for comfort and solitude. As a result of this establishment the cavalry of the Maharajah is magnificently mounted. The Kattiawar horse has a little curled tuft to the ear, somewhat like that of a lynx; and possesses very good legs. They brought us out the little Prince's ponies for inspection—one of them a tiny creature from Burmah, the gift of Mr. Grant Duff. We had seen the Heir-Apparent at the palace, and kissed his small, tender hand—a baby of between two and three years, with a pretty face and charming infantile manners. He was toddling about under the early morning sun in one of the pavilions, learning little words of Persian, and said in the sweetest and most irrelevant manner, "Good evening! Madam!" Not far from the stables was the lane of mud-built houses where the cheetahs, lynxes, and falcons were kept. The hunting leopards—very fine animals—were lazily stretched on charpoys in the hot noonday, their cream-coloured hides with the black velvet dots, and their savage, sarcastic faces, making wonderful pictures under the sunlight. The lynxes mewed and snarled beneath the trees to which they were chained, whining for blood when a monkey or chicken came in sight. Both are employed in the pursuit of antelope; and the first rush and leap of a cheetah when he breaks from cover, or bounds out of the nullah upon the Indian black buck, is one of the sights whose cruelty is half-redeemed by the spectacle of the splendid energy developed on one side and prodigious agility manifested on the other. That plunge of the leopard at the deer, and that spring of the buck, as he flings himself into the air to escape, are the supreme expressions of the forces of violence and fear.

We drove with the Diwan's brother, Mr. Nanoo Mull, to the great lake of Siliserh, where an embankment, skilfully devised, shuts in a long valley and fills it with pure mountain water, supplying the capital and keeping all the surrounding gardens and fields green. Along the road—which wound between high red hills among endless fields of cotton—strings of Meos, men and women, passed us, the latter wearing crimson and amber cholis and those glittering saris, inlaid with glass, before mentioned, which sparkle with every movement. In each field and grove the pea-fowl strutted about, sacred and secure; and the grey red-headed cranes in pairs—which nothing but death can separate—stalked along the edge of every pool. Peacocks are great favourites with the Rajputs. The bird is sacred to their war-god Kumara, and its feather was often carried in the turban of the Ulwur warriors; the reason, they declare, why it screams so loudly when thunder is heard is because the martial fowl “takes the noise for battle-drums.” If you did not see these creatures, nor notice the camels, the ox-wains, and the picturesquely attired people, Siliserh might have been Ullswater, so English were the bare hills and the bushy shores!

Our royal friend has a palace and a steam-launch here, and sometimes brings the ladies of the zenana for a little ruralising into the pure upland air. Sri Ram's brother beguiled the way with anecdotes of the young Maharajah's goodness. A week ago he was walking staff in hand when an old Rajput met him, and this conversation ensued:

"Ram! Ram! they say the Maharajah is here, where can I see him?"

"What do you want?"

"I have a petition to him; I am old and poor, and have been wronged by a great man."

"Give it to me, Baba!"

"Not so. I will trust nobody except Mangal Singh."

"But I know him, and will give it into his hand."

"Tell me where he is; they say he will always do justice."

"Such bat, old man! they say true. If he can, he will. Let me see the paper."

"It's only for the King's eye, Ji!"

"Well, then, I am the King!"

And then and there the Prince read the petition, and, finding it reasonable in its demand, issued on the spot an order which repaired the Rajput's wrongs. We left the picturesque valley of Ulwur glad to have become the friends of its loyal and gracious sovereign.

A short journey through a country, rapidly sinking from highland into lowland, brought us, as night fell, into the imperial city of Delhi. Our lodging was close to the Mori Gate, and to an embattled wall of masonry which stretches from that point to the Kashmir Gate, of deathless fame. A walk on the flat roof, as morning broke, revealed, close at hand, all the chief localities of the memorable siege of the city by the British in 1857. It is one of the most striking incidents of any wandering tour thus suddenly to behold a scene, new in its features, but familiar by association. Our roof, higher than the city wall, against which it rose, commanded the entire arena of those arduous and gallant efforts by which the Mogul capital was wrested from the mutineers, and India saved. On the extreme left, as you face the dense belt of verdure beyond the ramparts, is seen a lofty monument of red sandstone. This, which bears the record of all the many battles which preceded the storm, and the names of the officers and men who fell during the siege, marks the crest of "the Ridge," and is close to "Hindu Rao's House," now a hospital. In the centre may be perceived, over the trees, the battle-mented roof of "Ludlow Castle," where Commissioner Fraser was murdered; and to the right appears a corner of "Metcalf's House," upon the Jumna, the easternmost point of the besieging lines. On Sept. 14, 1857, the great day of the assault, the storming parties started from those three points. By tremendous efforts a force of 6000 men had been gathered, batteries had been established and put to work, pounding all this line of wall before you, so that it still hangs in ragged ruin, with whole masses of parapet and bastion demolished. Commanded by the heroic Nicholson—whose grave is not 500 yards from the Mori Tower—the three columns, only 1000 strong each of them, poured down those gradual slopes upon the guilty city. But, most of all, the attention is riveted on yonder low double-arched entrance, which fronts us at a distance of 600 yards. That is the Kashmir Gate, to blow in which Home and Salkeld, with their brave companions, English and Native, set forth at sunrise on that eventful morning, knowing they went to their death. There can be little need to repeat the details of the thrilling story of devotion. Every Englishman is aware how those dauntless gentlemen, with their nine British and native comrades, set the powder-bags to the door of the gate, and how the murderous musketry-fire levelled all but one, who put match to the bags, and shattered the right-hand leaf, through which Campbell's division burst triumphantly into the city. A tablet of red sandstone, set against the gate by Lord Napier of Magdala, commemorates the splendid service thus done to our Empire, and could not be the heart of him who can stand where those true soldiers died and not feel proud to be of the same race.

Enter the gate by the road which they have made so safe and peaceful, and you will see to the right the path under the wall along which the second column swept away the mutineers as far as the Mori bastion, and in front the route whereby the third column hewed its way to the Chandui Chouk, the great "Silver Street"

THE KASHMIR GATE, DELHI.

of Delhi, where they captured the Kotwali, now as before a police-station, close to that "Golden Mosque," sitting in which Nadir Shah ordered the massacre of the inhabitants in 1739. The scene of Nadir's wrath was hardly more terrible than when, arrested in the heart of the city by a horde of 20,000 desperate mutineers, with Nicholson dead, and Wilson disheartened, our slender forces could only just hold their positions, and the fate of India still trembled in the balance. But the rebel troops melted away by the open southern gates; inch by inch the bloodstained capital yielded; and we buy shawls and trinkets to-day as placidly as in Piccadilly on the very spot where Hodson laid the dead bodies of the princes of Delhi, whom he had pistolled near Humayoun's Tomb, and where the Great Rebellion practically ended in blood and conflagration. Sir Frederick Roberts related to me how the city of Delhi was at last occupied, after the long check caused by our losses. He was at the head of a detachment which made its way by surprise into a native building where fifty or sixty wounded rebels were lying. Being threatened with death, unless they showed our soldiers how to make their way to the "Silver Street," the Sepoys offered to conduct one officer to the proper spot for an attack. Sir Frederick, then a subaltern, volunteered to go, and it was notified that if he did not return alive and well in two hours the rebels would all be put to death. The guides took the General, disguised as a Hindu, through a labyrinth of back lanes and gardens, until, pushing open a shutter, they bade him look out. He was close to Manikchund's shop in the great street, gazing upon a crowd of mutineers, who were cooking, smoking, gambling, and in disorderly ease, but very numerous. Our pioneer returned thirty minutes after his time and found the soldiers about to despatch the prisoners, thinking their officer sacrificed; but he now led them by the way thus discovered, and bursting forth with his handful of men from the shop door, terrified the mutineers into a tumultuous retreat. The main body of the support was soon brought up, and thus at last Delhi was really taken.

To the right, at the end of this Chandni Chouk, is the Lahore, now Victoria, Gate, which leads by a covered bazaar to the magnificent fortress-palace of the Emperors. You traverse it, and emerge into a spacious square, where stand the majestic Diwân-i-A'm, with its thirty-two red columns, and the royal seat of white marble; to its right the splendid and beautiful Diwân-i-Khâs, the Private Hall of Audience of the Emperors, with close at hand the Moti Musjid, or "Pearl Mosque," a white wonder of architecture, and the sumptuous Akab Baths. In the audience hall once stood that throne—the Takt-i-Taüs—which cost six millions sterling, being composed of two peacocks of gold with spread tails, all fashioned to the life with sapphires, emeralds, rubies, and diamonds, between them hovering a parrot of the natural size carved out of a solid emerald, and overhead a canopy of beaten gold supported by twelve golden columns. Here sate in State the Great

THE DIWAN-I-KHAS, DELHI.

Moguls; but an almost higher idea is given of their grandeur by the white marble Bath Chambers adjoining, where rivulets of crystal water were made to wander through channels of polished alabaster, over slabs of inlaid stone, and the lips of silver and gold basins. Nothing in imperial Rome ever exceeded the magnificence of these royal retreats of Shah Jehan and Aurengzebe, or the delicate beauty of their zenana, looking through pierced marble lattices upon the Jumna. Over one gold and satin archway of this building the architect has written in a proud Persian verse :

“ If on the earth there be a bower of bliss,
That place is this, is this, is this, is this ! ”

From the splendour of such a marble paradise, the last of the Moguls, Bahadur Shah, was taken by us to die a prisoner at Rangoon, and the Queen's ensign is quietly flying over the cupolas of the Gate as we pass, nor is Derby more peaceful now or contentedly British than Delhi. You buy bulbuls at two annas apiece on the steps and in the courts of the stately and exclusive Jumma Musjid; stroll through the chattering crowd in the place where Nicholson fell, and feed monkeys in the gardens of the princesses of Baber; while outside the walls, crumbled by our angry artillery twenty-nine years ago, the bugles ring from the Camp of Exercise, where lies an English army 40,000 strong, powerful enough and sufficiently well-equipped to march through Asia, if need were. Next month it will manœuvre in mimic war from the ancient battlefield of Paniput down to the park-like plains that encircle the city.

The contrast between the past and present of Delhi was very forcibly brought to mind when, standing upon the "Ridge" and studying the old fighting-ground, we suddenly encountered once again the Commander-in-Chief. Sir Frederick Roberts was riding over from his camp to survey the scene of the forthcoming movements, and kindly explained the nature of those siege operations in which he bore part as a subaltern in 1857. So dense is now the forest-like growth of mango, tamarind, and acacia trees around the walls that a visitor is at first puzzled to comprehend how the British gunners could possibly have sighted the bastions which they desired to reduce. But the General makes it all clear by telling us that the besieging force sent parties out each night to fell all the trees within a belt of six hundred yards from the walls, and he points to a curtain, still a mass of ruin, "which we peppered night and day." And then he adds, "I am pitched at present, with my headquarters camp, on the precise spot which I occupied in 1857 'in my little tent.'" The whole history of the period lay condensed in that sentence, and the explanation of it was to be had in the fearless valour illustrated by those low twin-arches of the Kashmir Gate. In returning to the city we dismounted to walk with reverence and gratitude through the portal opened by the self-sacrifice of Home and his comrades.

XII.

THE CAMP OF EXERCISE AT DELHI.

DELHI is astir, outside and inside her walls, with "the pomp, pride, and circumstance of glorious war." An army of forty thousand troops of all arms—the flower of the Queen-Empress' forces in India—has been gathered under the ramparts on the northern face of the city, or dispersed over its plains to the South. This powerful host, with all its vast following, its expanded encampments, its endless lines of camels, horses, asses, and commissariat carts, has been concentrated there to perform certain elaborate martial manœuvres, after which one division will draw off to the northward, as far, it is thought, as the famous plain of Paniput, while the other will close in from the Kootub Minar upon Delhi. Then there will be an advance made from Paniput upon the city, which, notwithstanding the gallant defence sure to be offered, must, it is said, prove successful; and, afterwards, the Northern and Southern forces will peaceably coalesce, and march past the Viceroy, surrounded by his great officers of State, and many of the proudest princes of India, the entire proceedings furnishing, beyond all doubt, the finest military spectacle ever witnessed in Hindostan.

General Sir Frederick Roberts is himself at the head of the Northern force; the Southern has been confided to Sir Charles Macgregor, K.C.S.I. Distinguished visitors from foreign countries have repaired hither to witness and criticise this full-dress parade of her Majesty's Oriental troops, and for weeks past the bazaars and environs of Delhi have been gay with horse and foot soldiers wearing almost all the uniforms known from Comorin to Attock, the renowned red coat of "Tommy Atkins" conspicuously mingling with the yellow turbans of stalwart Sikhs, the variegated puggris of Bengali North-Western Cavalry, the fluttering pennons of Madras and Bombay Lancers, and the familiar dark blue of our own Artillery. Along with the army thus gathered up there have flocked into the ancient capital of the Mogul innumerable spectators, so that all the hotels are full, and every convenient spot or shady tree has been seized upon for a private encampment. On all sides may be caught the gleam of white canvas through the dense belt of foliage surrounding the city walls; and the thunder of guns, saluting from the Fort, announces from time to time the arrival of some Indian prince with his retinue. Each of these native magnates brings a well-stocked purse, and many of the officers connected with the Army of Exercise have lodged their wives or relations in the city or the civil bungalows—for no ladies, of course, are allowed within the camp itself. The consequence is that trade flourishes, and the faces of the Delhi dealers in shawls, brocades, kincobs, jewellery, miniature paintings, and the like, are visibly whitened. Manikchund, in the Chandni Chouk, the famous merchant of all such glittering goods, has laid in a fabulous store of novelties from Srinuggar and from the looms of the North. His shop is occupied from morning until night with customers, at whose feet a dozen patient attendants perpetually unroll dazzling webs of woven silk and gold, shawls of tender colour, embroidered with unheard-of labour by hands contented to achieve one or two such wonders of industry in each year. The carpet of his inner jewellery room shines from dawn to dusk with heaps of bracelets, necklaces, earrings, and filagree-work of gold and silver. The grain-sellers, the gharry-wallahs, the hay and wood cutters are also all making piles of rupees by this peaceful invasion, which occupies everybody's mind.

Exigencies of time, and engagements contracted in Ceylon and the South of India with Buddhist friends, forbade us to accept the Commander-in-Chief's polite and pressing invitation to be present at the battle and the march-past; but we have seen latterly a good deal of the two camps, and have had the honour of dining with the staff in Sir Frederick Roberts' tent at headquarters. The Southern force has been lying beyond the Kootub Minar, about eleven miles from Delhi, in a country flat, like all the district round about the city, but broken with nullahs and ancient buildings, and so affording useful ground for the various manœuvres in which it was desired to exercise Sir Charles Macgregor's divisions. A drive to this point takes you through some very interesting portions of old Delhi, as well as brings the explorer upon a military spectacle of singular charm and novelty. The road leads by the majestic Jumma Musjid, the largest mosque in all the nations of Islam, the boast of Shah Jehan and of Aurungzebe, in which are deposited, besides many precious copies of the "Perspicuous Book," the Kafsh-i-Mubáarak, or Prophet's slipper, filled with jasmine, and the Mui-i-Mubáarak, a hair of Muhammad's moustache. You may turn aside a little, to see the ruins of Indrapat, the ancient Indraprastha, capital of King Yudhisthira of the Mahábhárata, the tomb of Azizah Kokal Tash, foster-brother of Akbar the Great, and also that of the ~~pool~~ Shosrau, whom Saadi himself visited for the sake of his "Majnun and Leila." Returning to the Ajmir Gate road the observatory of Jey Singh is passed, exactly resembling that at Jey-pore, with massive gnomons and astrolabes of masonry. Farther on rises the handsome monument of Safdar Jung, who fought with the Rohillas, and, being defeated, took the fatal step of calling in the Marathas. All this district, indeed, near and far, is covered with ruined mosques and tombs, some in marble, some in sandstone, some of both materials mixed; so that wherever the eye falls it lights upon domes, cupolas, arches, and columns, showing amidst the groves, or towering above them, a very wilderness of vanished pride and splendour. There must be hundreds of stately edifices thus scattered over the face of this Southern plain, and beneath their ruins lie the remains of five or six successive cities, for here is the grave of dynasties, the very Golgotha of bygone empires.

THE OLD FORT, DELHI.

Through their crumbling relics you arrive at last at the group of ancient buildings in the midst of which the Kutub Minar lifts its lofty beauty to the sky, a pillar of fluted masonry two hundred and forty feet high, embellished at each of its tapering stories with inscriptions in the Tughra character of Arabic, which is so ornamental. The second story of the marvellous pillar is completely belted with the Asma-el-husna, the "Ninety-nine Beautiful Names of Allah." The three lowest stories of this pillar of victory are made of a warm red sandstone, the upper ones of white Ulwur marble. Sultan Altamsh completed it in 1230 A.D. No one can imagine the effect of this conical column, with its deep flutings and diminishing cones, soaring, blood-colour and snow-white, into the blue—twice the height of the Duke of York's column, and adorned with flowing deep-cut Arab scripts, with sculptured lamps, bells, and bosses? Hard by is the mosque of Kutbu 'l Islâm, which Ibn Batuta describes with such admiration, built in 1191 A.D. of the fragments of twenty-seven Hindoo temples, the ancient fanes of Brahmanical Delhi. It is curious here to observe the mutilated figures of Indian mythology blended with Moslem inscriptions and Pathan cupolas; while, close at hand, is the famous iron pillar, "the Arm of Renown of Raja Dhâva." This is a solid shaft of malleable iron, said to be more than sixty feet long, reckoning the underground portion, and seventeen inches in diameter; deeply planted in the earth, where it is believed to rest on the head of the Great Snake, the King of the Nagas. Many inscriptions are upon the shaft, and the dint of a cannon-ball may be seen which Nadir Shah fired at it, with the intention of breaking down the idolatrous "Lat." But it stands, and may well stand unshaken for ten thousand years longer. A group of Sikhs and Bengali Sepoys at the pillar were trying their destiny. If you have the orthodox belief and can make your hands meet round it, standing with your back to the iron, the chances are that your next existence will be agreeable. We did not consult an oracle not propitious to "Kaffirs," and, moreover, based upon such wholly gymnastic conditions. Should you diverge a few miles eastward Jughlakabad may be visited—a citadel full of ruins and tombs, haunted by panthers and cheetahs, amid its thick undergrowth of thorns and cactus. The monument of Jûnâ Khân is there, the Khuni Sultan, or "Murderous King," a cruel tyrant, whose successor, Firoz Shah, procured written acquittances from many of those whom he had oppressed, and placed them in a chest at the foot of the King's tomb, in order that he might show them to the Angels of Judgment, Mukir and Nakir, and so, perhaps, escape punishment.

Two miles beyond the Kutub Minar—the "Written Monument"—upon a flat, sandy plain, the encampment of the Southern Division was reached. It is at a place called Sultanpur, well suited and well known for a pitching-ground, with a perfectly dry loose soil, good for health and for tent-peg driving, and supplied with many excellent wells. Topes of dark-green verdure fringe the maidan, which has near it some massive ruins and a little village with a lively bazaar. Nothing could seem more soldierly or business-like than this camp of Sir Charles Macgregor, with its nine thousand or ten thousand men. The unprofessional visitor would expect to find a luxurious city of canvas, with comfortable durbar and bechoba tents, and all those lavish appurtenances familiar to the pleasant jungle-life of Indian districts in the cold weather. But here all was stern simplicity. Long streets of little booths of canvas sheltered everybody alike; generals and officers, non-commissioned officers and privates lodging, as far as could be seen, in the same small rowti, or eighty-pound tent, of the "Cabul scale" pattern. You can pack this up, roofs, kanauts, pegs, ropes, and all, in a bundle weighing exactly that amount, which then goes on one side of a pony, while all the kit of the tent swings on the other. The commander himself was housed in much the same kind of tiny gipsy-booth, and only the quarter guards of each regiment and the messes had square tents.

THE KUTUB MINAR.

In the mile-long vista of those airy abodes which we traversed first lay the famous regiment of "Rattray's Sikhs," clad in Khaki or dust-colour suits, with turbans of mustard-tint, as stout and serviceable men as need be seen, not likely to lose Delhi to anybody less irresistible than Sir Frederick Roberts. Next were camped the Seaforth Highlanders, kilted and sun-helmeted; and facing them the splendid squadrons of the 13th Bengal Native Cavalry, wearing an uniform of dark blue and red, the same colours fluttering from their lance-heads, stuck by the butts into the sand in clusters before their tents, or ranged along the lines where their Australian chargers were picketed. Each stirrup-iron of these horsemen is furnished with a socket, into which the shaft of the lance can be slipped, relinquishing which he can pass his bridle hand or sword-arm through a leathern thong fastened to the black bamboo shaft and ride entirely unencumbered. Beyond the Bengalee cavalry lay a famous Highland regiment, and then various native horse and foot, most of them of the highest apparent efficiency. The 17th Lancers came next, under Colonel Boulderson, and beyond were some sappers and miners, and batteries of artillery. Enormous piles of porter-barrels testified to the deathless thirst of the British soldier, and little enclosures of dried mud, with cooking-places of the same material, showed where the high-caste Sepoys dressed their simple dinners, which would become unclean, and be thrown away, if the shadow of the Commander-in-Chief himself should pass over them. Sir Frederick Roberts had been here recently, scouring the country on horseback, all day in the saddle; and many useful marches and counter-marches had been performed by this force under the critical award of umpires. Far off the Geneva Cross—red on a white ground—floated over the hospital tents, which, happily, were nearly empty. You beheld an encampment precisely as it would appear in war, with guns, ammunition, pontoons, transport, all in perfect order, all designed for service, not for show. It would be unbecoming in a non-professional spectator to animadvert upon what he cannot properly judge; but the one deficiency which struck the attention, both superficially and after inquiry, was the lack of English officers with the native regiments. It was good to see them wearing the turban of their regiment, and dwelling so amicably with their obedient men, but painful to note how few they were.

The headquarters of the Army of Exercise lay behind the Ridge, about two miles from Delhi. There the Commander-in-Chief occupied a much more elaborate encampment, as befitted his rank and responsibilities—pitched, as was before remarked, in the self-same spot where his tent, as a subaltern, stood during the great siege. The General's quarters were to the right of the Allipur road, approached upon gravelled paths, through vistas of tropical plants and broad archways leading into a spacious canvas mansion, as handsome and well furnished as any dwelling could be. We had the honour of sojourning there, and, excellent as the banquet was, the conversation, rich with the recollections and opinions of the many distinguished officers present, was even a better feast. It turned, after some talk of the forthcoming manœuvres, upon the incidents of the siege of which every surrounding spot offered some memorial, and the conviction left upon my mind was that accurate history is really impossible. I heard published accounts of the storming of the city gainsaid upon the highest authority in a hundred particulars. The chief told me himself exactly how the Chandni Chouk was gained, and that story has been already related; albeit histories give a very different account. Then, too, it is currently stated that Outram and Campbell met at Lucknow, in the open, and sensational paintings have been exhibited, depicting the generals grasping hands on horseback, amid a brilliant staff, and a great crowd of soldiers and spectators. The Commander-in-Chief, however, who was one of the relieving column, laughingly explained to me that these heroes met through a hole in the Residency wall practised by the pickaxe of a sapper, and recounted particulars of the retirement which utterly refute the second-hand accounts of the accepted books. It seems a sad conclusion, yet nothing in fiction is so false as history. The historian pretends to know too much; but if he came upon the ground, and spoke with the actors, he would blot every other line. All about the country, far and near, in the vicinity of headquarters, gleamed groups of tents, by scores and hundreds, with painted boards, denoting here the Commissariat, there the Pontoon Corps; in another spot the Transport. Horses going in troops to be exercised or watered, carts in interminable lines, creaking along with fodder;

heavy guns rumbling, camels snorting, orderlies galloping hither and thither, flags fluttering in the breeze, bugles blowing cheery calls, the roll of drums, the tramp of feet, arms brightly glittering and brilliant uniforms glancing to and fro—the scene represented all the picturesqueness of war without its terror and sorrow. The English public have learned from other sources the details of the military movements which were to ensue, and the names and bearing of all the distinguished regiments present on the day of the grand march-past, the 19th of January. This is only a sketch, in slight and light outlines, of the aspect which the environs of the Imperial City presented during the marching and counter-marching of the various forces drawn to the walls of Delhi.

I had, however, a particular desire to see Paniput, the famous plain where the Northern Divisions were to concentrate, and where so many great and fatal battles have been waged. It was there that the Kuru and Pandu princes of the Mahâbhârata fought their gigantic contest, after the god Krishna had pronounced to Arjuna in his war-chariot the divine verses of the Bhagavad-Gîta. There also Baber, Timur, and Nadir Shah slew hecatombs; and upon that same plain—like Bœotia, a very "Ἄρεος ὀρχήστρα, a "dancing ground of Mars"—Akbar broke Hemu, the general of Sultan Adili, and Ahmed Shah Abdali bloodily defeated the Mahrattas. No one outside the Intelligence Department knew much about this place, which lies off the line of railway on the right bank of the Jumna, about fifty-four miles north of Delhi, upon the Kurnâl road, and is seldom or never visited by Sahebs. It seemed, however, that there must be some commanding physical conditions in the contour of the district to account for its importance in history—conditions which it would be interesting to study, besides the high classical import of the spot to any student of Hindu philosophy, as the scene chosen for the sublime “Song Celestial.”

I resolved, therefore, to undertake a little private expedition to Paniput, and “laid a dâk” for that purpose. The road leads over “the Ridge,” past the chief localities of the English position in the siege of 1857, and through the village of Budli-ka-Serai, where the rescuing troops first met the mutineers. Thereafter it continues in a perfectly straight course, over a vast plain unbroken by the slightest acclivity during all the twenty-seven kos of the route. This is—and must always have been—the main line of communication from Umballa and the Punjaub; and, admirably metalled at present with kunkar, it is shaded for the most part with groves of acacia, tamarind, and peepul trees, and bordered with far-stretching flats, sometimes grass-clad like a cricket-field, sometimes studded with clumps of palm and thorn and pretty interspersed bushes like a vast Indian park. From time to time a large pool lies alongside the road, where herons, bitterns, and the great grey cranes placidly fish. A stream now and then, trickling to the Jumna, necessitates a bridge; and frequent wayside wells tempt the camel-drivers and byl-wallahs to form a picturesque encampment. But, all throughout, the route to Paniput is level as a billiard-table, and the herds of antelope on either side may be watched bounding away for miles. As far, therefore, as fighting-ground is concerned, any one five square miles of this enormous flat would serve as well as another, in regard to what the traveller can judge. Perhaps the entire plain was called Kurukshetra by the Hindus of the Mahâbhârata, on one side as well as the other of the sacred river.

Arriving before sundown at the town of Paniput, I passed a little beyond its mouldering walls of brick to put up at a lonely dâk bungalow, very seldom tenanted. The sandy compound of this retreat looked forth on an equally sandy maidan, where a white vulture, perched on a broken chatty, alone enlivened the scene. Yet somewhere about, in this great expanse, those antique armies had certainly struggled and bled, and, if old records were true, nigh upon a million of Hindu, Moslem, and Afghan warriors had left their bones or ashes within view of the self-same spot where my rice was cooking. There were, indeed, mounds to the southward of possible strategic importance on such an endless plain, and the flat roofs of Paniput town climbed a little upon the slope of what seemed a slight ridge. No doubt this place, occupying almost the only rising ground for leagues around, and distant about nine miles from the Jumna, on a terrain perfectly suited for elephants and calvary, would be a very probable battlefield. It is about as far as a defending host might move forth to cover Indraprastha or Delhi—about as near as an invader might be allowed to come unopposed after outlying victories. In the town itself some Brahman, or native of authority, would be sure to know where Bhao Saheb and Ahmed Shah contended, and where ancient tradition fixed the field of the Bhagavad-Gîta and of the great battle fought by the Kuru princes.

Accordingly, I entered the crumbled portals of Paniput and inquired for the burra admi, the chief personage. This was universally said to be “the Nawab Sahib,” and I was led by a group of obliging residents through many narrow and mean streets to an old house, where, responding to his name, an extremely aged Muslim gentleman appeared. He was well-nigh blind with ophthalmia and quite toothless, but delightfully courteous, and much interested. He said he had heard his grandfather speak of “Bhao Saheb’s” dreadful battle, and how he died on his elephant. He knew that Ahmed Shah “beat the Mahrattas, and slew a lakh of them, and shut another lakh into this same town of Paniput, all of whom he massacred next morning, setting them out of the gates in lots, ‘like sheep at Bairam.’” We held this historical inquest, seated on rugs, in his courtyard, amid some five score of townspeople; but he did not know, nor care one cowrie, where the ancient Pandu battle was fought. Thanking the garrulous old gentleman, I resumed my quest, hunting now for some Brahman ; but the Christmas holidays had caused the one schoolmaster of the place to be absent, and the only other Brahman in the town, except a Shastri who was sick, had never read the Bhagavad-Gîta, and did not even know the name "Kurukshetra." An intelligent Hindu boy, by way of consolation, offered to guide me to a bahut purâna nishan, a "very old monument;" but when we arrived on the spot this proved to be only a marble tablet commemorating the death of Ibrahim Lodi, killed in 1526 A.D., with seven thousand of his men, at Paniput, by Baber at the head of his Cabul army. That was an important fight, for it gave Delhi to Baber ; but it was matter of yesterday, comparatively, to what I wished to learn. Ram Balaji copied for me the inscription, and it was the only record I found in the vicinity, which was, in fact, absorbed about cotton-selling, and quite oblivious of its own renown in history. When I quitted the little bungalow at one stage distant from the famous but forgetful spot, I inscribed on its whitewash this brief memorandum of my failure :

"From Delhi's walls to Paniput I came,
 To view those scenes of immemorial fame
 Where Asia's sceptre thrice was lost and won,
 And Bhagavad-Gîta told to Pritha's son.
 But where on "Kurukshetra" that was taught None knew, nor if the ancient fights were fought ;
 Therefore—bethinking what a dream is Fame—
 To Delhi, back from Paniput, I came."

As we quit Delhi for Agra the thunder of guns from the Lahore Gate announces the arrival of new princes, a rajah from Sindh being the last comer. They have pitched handsome quarters, surrounded by high square canvas walls, for these distinguished visitors, and each pair of foreign guests deputed by the European Governments will find charming tents ready for their occupation, surrounded by flowers and plants, and marked by the flag of their nationality. It was a disappointment not to witness the splendid military pageant, and just as we start the kind Chief despatches an orderly, inviting us to assist at a tent-pegging on the morrow, where the finest horsemanship in the army would be displayed. To linger, however, until the 19th, even at Delhi, would be to lose Ceylon, and the Buddhists of Kandy—to whom we are faithfully promised—as well as other old engagements; and, therefore, we must cross the Jumna, and take a last look at the splendid Jumma Musjid, whose minarets and cupolas arise so majestically over the city of the Great Mogul.

THE JUMMA MUSJID, DELHI.

XIII.

AGRA AND THE TAJ.

It would be difficult to find a railway station anywhere which lands its passengers upon a more remarkable scene than that at Agra. You emerge into the open space amid the usual brightly-clad crowd, and are arrested on the step of the carriage by the imposing spectacle presented upon either hand. To the right soar the minarets and domes of an immense mosque, the Jumma Musjid of the city, built by Shah Jehan, in 1644 A.D., in honour of the good Princess Jehanâra, his daughter, who was buried at Delhi, after sharing the seven years' captivity of her father, deposed by Aurungzebe. This is a massive structure of sandstone, the great domes of which are diversified by a zigzag pattern in layers of white marble, producing a strange but picturesque effect; and to the left the vast red walls and bastions of Akbar's Fort climb upwards like sea-cliffs, facing the station with a huge battlemented gateway, and with long lines of crenulated parapet, under which runs in a broad stream, divided by many sandbanks, the sacred Yamuna, or Jumna, flowing grandly down to join the Ganges, and forming with that river the fertile Doab, the fairest portion of Hindustan Proper.

Within these lofty walls are hidden, as the traveller will well know, the finest monuments of the Mogul time, as well as some of the favourite retreats of the Sultans; and it is right that the first object to seize attention at Akbar's city should remind one of that truly great sovereign, whose tolerance and rare artistic taste created what may be called the new school of Hindustani architecture. Akbar loved India. The hearts of Baber and Humayoun were always away in Central Asia, where one of them died; but the son of Hamida, the Persian girl, born at Umurkot on the Indus, who began to rule as a boy of fourteen, and lived to prove so powerful a monarch, knew no country except his empire of Hindostan, and gave himself, heart and soul, to the idea of blending in India conquerors and conquered into one people. It is notable that the Hindus believed him to be one of their own people returned to earth, and all the more when one day he dug up at the confluence of the Jumna and Ganges the dish, the bottle, and the deer-skin of an anchorite; articles which they supposed must have appertained to the Emperor in a previous existence. He chose Hindu princesses for his wives; favoured and cultivated Hindu literature, albeit he himself could neither read nor write; took Hindu statesmen into his deepest confidence, and by employing Hindu artists and masons, and giving them free play upon the old conventional Persian and Mogul models, he founded for India what comes nearest to a national style of building, wherein her old delicate skill of detailed ornament has mingled with the original strength of the invader's designs, so that, even now, many a graceful private mansion or forgotten temple in the by-streets of Indian cities proves how thoroughly Hindustani architecture is a living art. The breadth of Akbar's religious views, his generous interest in all forms of thought, his love of the many good qualities in his Indian subjects, and his dislike of the bigotry and fierceness of his own Mogul countrymen; the grace, the joyfulness, the courage, and the kindness of the man, until those later years when the vices of his children disheartened him and his strong nature yielded, make Agra a veritable place of pilgrimage for those who remember Akbar's virtues and overlook his faults.

He even invented a reconciling religion. Mr. Keene says: "The so-called 'Divine Monotheism' of Akbar was an attempt to throw off the rules of Islam, and substitute an eclectic system obtained by putting together the systems of Zoroaster, of the Brahmans, and of Christianity, and retaining some Mohammedan forms. Few leading Moslems and only one Hindu (Birbul) embraced it; and it fell at the death of its founder, owing to the opposition of sincere believers and the indifference of the new Emperor Jehangir. But the Hindus continued to prosper till the time of Aurungzebe. Of Akbar's peers fifty-seven were Hindus out of about four hundred; under his grandson Shah Jehan, out of six hundred and nine, one hundred and ten were Hindus. Neither Akbar nor Jehangir converted their Hindu wives to the faith of Islam." Faults the great Emperor certainly had. His city of Futtehpour-Sikri, built at enormous cost to his people, in a place where no man could live long because of the bad air and water, was a caprice so costly as to seem cruel; and beautiful as are the buildings in this city and at Delhi, due to his hand or to his influence, who has not heard of that fatal sweetmeat box which the Emperor carried, one side of which contained innocent pastilles of honey and almonds, and the other partition sweet-scented lozenges imbued with deadly poison? If Akbar gave you a bonbon from the kind side of his box you were in high favour at court, and likely to command a province soon or to receive the charge of five thousand horse. If he smilingly offered you one from the other part you could not refuse—for none dared to say "No!" to Akbar—and your mouth for awhile became full of the fragrance of nard and myrrh, while you rode hurriedly home in your litter, and there died before the golden palace robes could well be stripped off. They say that Akbar himself perished by making a mistake one evening when he wished for a sweetmeat.

Agra contained, however, for one of us a memory of deeper and nearer, though humbler interest. Many years ago, in the time of the great Mutiny, a dear friend of mine went out to India to join the Educational Department. Frederic Cairns Hubbard was a man of noble character and a scholar of the highest promise. Educated at the King's School, Rochester, he became distinguished there for his classical and mathematical proficiency, and afterwards took a very high degree in both schools at Cambridge, when he had finished his terms in Caius College. Appointed Professor of Mathematics, first to Calicut, and afterwards to the College at Agra, he was to have joined me at the Deccan College, to which I had been elected Principal; our hope being to pass many years together in associated Indian work. But, on the eve of my own departure for Poona, news came that the mutiny had broken out, and that among the first victims of that sad period had fallen this good and gifted friend. He had refused, with characteristic manliness, to take refuge in the Fort when almost all the other Europeans crowded into that asylum, and calmly continued his class-work, sitting at home each evening with a loaded revolver laid on either side of the mathematical papers he was revising. On July 5, 1857, it was determined by the authorities to go forth and fight the mutineers at Futtehpore-Sikri, and Mr. Hubbard at once volunteered for the expedition. He had set out on horseback for the Fort, taking a short cut from his bungalow which led to a bridge over a nullah, at an open part of the city suburbs, where there stood—and yet stands—a police-station. As he approached this place, suspecting, of course, no danger, since the police officers were, as usual, at their post, one of these very men, passing up and down with his musket, suddenly turned, levelled the piece at Mr. Hubbard, and shot him dead.

TOMB OF ITMAD-OOD-DOWLAH, AGRA.

His body lay for three days where it fell from the saddle, until a detachment from the Fort, patrolling the streets, picked up his corpse along with those of other Europeans slaughtered in the town. I met in Mr. Sheo Narayan, Secretary of the Municipal Board of Agra, a native gentleman who had known Mr. Hubbard well, and been his pupil. He remembered the merry fortitude with which my friend had said, "I am a professor of mathematics, not a woman! I shall go on with my duties, and if anybody who hates conic sections interrupts me by violence I shall defend myself." He showed me the narrow path by which Hubbard took his last ride, the bridge-foot where he received the fatal shot, the very spot where the assassin stood, and afterwards we visited together his college rooms, his dwelling-house, and the slab of grey sandstone which marks the place in the Civil Cemetery where were laid the mortal remains of one of the best, the most gifted, and the gentlest of men, who would have assuredly done good service to the Hindu people among whom he fell. His murderer was of the Marwarie caste, a man of Ulwur, and was afterwards hanged for the crime; which judicial vengeance, however natural, my friend would, I know, have deprecated and regretted.

After paying the private debt of recollection due to this one of many unrecorded English heroes, our first duty was, of course, to visit the Taj, and the next was to see the tomb where the dust of Akbar the Magnificent lies. The site of the Emperor's burial is called Sikundra, and is distant about five miles from the Fort Gate. It is approached by a superb archway of red sandstone, massive and majestic, crowned with great scrolls of Arabic, being the "Chapter of the Kingdom" from the Koran. The white marble minarets on either side are broken, and broken is the patterned pavement by which you pass through a large but melancholy garden to the mausoleum of the Emperor. This is a vast mosque-like structure of red sandstone, diversified with marbles of many colours, having an imposing central entrance, and on each side of this main arch five smaller archways. Large flowers and bold arabesques run along the architraves, inlaid in brilliant hues. The entrance-chamber was originally vaulted with diapers, of blue and gold, the splendid effect of which may be judged by a small portion which has been recently renovated. By this grand approach you are led to the highest of four platforms, where, in the centre of a square upper pavilion, surrounded by lattice-work of wonderful pierced marble, the cenotaph of the Emperor stands. On one side of this monument are written in Arabic the words with which he used to be saluted, Allahu Akbar—"God is Great", and on the other those with which he was wont to reply to his obsequious courtiers, Jalla jallalahu—"May His glory be glorified." A yard or so from the monument rises a marble pillar, which was formerly coated with gold plates, and provided with a receptacle in which the Koh-i-Noor was kept. Around this central shrine, at the base of the edifice, are many little chapels, where similar but humbler memorials exist to other members of the Imperial line, among them a daughter of Aurungzebe. But to see where Akbar's dust really reposes you must come down from the proud and lofty pavilion, and the beautiful white corridors lighted of old with that great diamond, and by the Indian sunshine filtering upon it through those pierced panels; you must descend a gloomy subterranean slope paved with black flagstones, steep and rugged, and rapidly retreating from the glad warmth of the Indian morning outside into chilly shadows. This brings you to a dismal vaulted chamber, of conical form, a huge sepulchral cellar, which has no touch of defunct royalty about it, except some faint vestiges of gold and blue upon the roof, dimly illuminated by one square aperture. In the middle of the floor is thus perceived a white tombstone, the high polish of which catches what little light flickers about the place. This plain marble bears no inscription whatever; only on the top of it is seen the Kalamdan carved upon a man's grave-slab by the Moguls. And under this simple stone lie the bones of Akbar the Magnificent, in a darkness which daylight was wont to penetrate only once a year in the old Imperial days. Now the place is always open to visitors; but the Khadim in charge had reverently set a tumbler of flowers on the Mecca side of the grave, and spoke in a whisper, as if the mighty Akbar might still hear and resent any want of obeisance.

THE TOMB OF AKBAR, SECUNDRA.

The Fort, already spoken of, contains within its vast red walls a whole town of splendid Mogul buildings. They are grouped together in a rich profusion of architecture not to be understood, unless it is remembered that the Mogul was a man of camps, and imitated in walled cities his own bygone habits of the desert. Thus, alike at Futtehpour-Sikri and in this wonderful Agra Fort, edifice is crowded upon edifice within a narrow space, just as tents would have been in a Bactrian encampment. Moreover, the general design is virtually the same. The Dewan-i-Am, which you first see, with its three rows of thirty-six columns fronting the sunlight, where the place of the throne is still marked; the Dewan-i-Khas, a marvel of elaborate work, carved and beautified beyond the power of any words to convey; the Jehangir Mahal, and the beautiful mosques themselves, the Nagina and the Moti, all suggest tents and tent-poles, and the Kanauts or curtains of tents lifted high for light and air. These buildings are, in fact, all open halls, facing with tent-like fronts the square or the river on one side, and having secret apartments or recesses at the back, like the women's portion of a Turanian Kibitka. But, of course, from the most sumptuous green silk tent of Timur to the least of all these lovely edifices at Agra, Delhi, or Futtehpour-Sikri, is a longer step than from the lowest Mongol camp-follower to Akbar's intellect and capacity. The Dewan-i-Khas, with its embroiderered arches and pilasters, and its inlaying of jewel-work, would alone suffice to render any city famous. Yet this is only one of the many treasures enshrined in the fortalice of Akbar. You pass from the columned grace and lightness of the Hall of Audience, upon a terrace overlooking the broad channel of the Jumna, with the snow-white domes of the Taj showing in the distance. Close to the balustrade of this terrace is placed a broad and solid slab of black stone, on which the throne of Akbar was set, while he administered justice to the crowds of his people assembled in the courtyard below. The stone is cracked right across, and there are rusty-red stains upon it, due, no doubt, to some ferreous oxide in the marble. The Khadim, however, tells you that the seat of the Emperor broke spontaneously and in indignation when the Jat usurper first sate there; and that the gout of blood appeared on it because of his tyranny. Close at hand, approached by hidden passages, is the Muchchi Bhawan, a quadrangle of marble kiosks and pavilions, the central hollow of which was once filled with water and stocked with gold and silver fish; and there is a pretty open turret, with satin-white seats and pierced windows, from which the lovely ladies of the Court were wont to angle.

Yet again you wander, by a corridor of marble and some shining steps, by once-secret bowers of the zenana and bath-rooms, cool in the hottest noon, to a pair of brazen gates, spoil brought by Akbar from Chittore; and these admit the delighted visitor to a small, secluded mosque, dedicated to the use of those same lovely queens and odalisques of the Great Mogul for their daily devo-

ROOF OF ZENANA IN THE FORT, AGRA.

tions. Here is the Nagina, or "Gem"—all of white marble, and delicately beautiful enough for the knees of the sweetest and stateliest of votaries. But it is a seed-pearl only to the Great Pearl adjoining, the famous Moti Musjid, the edifice which is a fair and perfect sister to Shah Jehan's other consummate work, the Taj Mahal. A heavy door of carved timber is thrust open by the Khadim, and you stand in a Muslim shrine, where only two colours are needed by the artist who would endeavour to depict it—the blue of the enroofing sky and the silvery white of the surrounding alabaster. All is sapphire and snow; a sanctuary without any ornament except its own supreme and spotless beauty of surface and material. Three milky cupolas crown the holy place of prayer, approached by milk-white steps from the white enclosure, in the middle of which opens a marble tank, within the waters whereof the fifty-eight white pillars of the cloister glass their delicate twelve-sided shafts and capitals of subtle device. It is not quite exact to write that this Pearl of all Churches has no embellishment. Passages from the Koran are inscribed over some of the doorways and engrailed arches, in flowing Arabic, wrought of black marble, deftly inlaid upon the tender purity of the alabaster. The delicate stone itself has here and there tints of rose colour of pale amber, and of faint blue, and is carved on many a panel and pilaster into soft fancies of spray and flower, scroll and arabesque. These slight variations from the prevailing pureness of the surface however, no more mar the unsullied appearance of the mosque, than the meandering veins, the flush of the blood, and the shadows of the warm flesh impair the whiteness of a beautiful woman's body :

“Cool, as to tread in summer-time on snows,
It was to loiter there.”

In 1857 this divine retreat was used by the European refugees as an hospital, and one would think that the wildest delirium of the sick or the wounded must have been calmed into peace by an asylum so quiet, so tender, and so solemn.

In the south-east angle of this palace-crowded Fort they use also, as military cells, the Baoli, or Well-Room, and the other basement apartments whereto the Emperor and his ladies would retreat when the fierce heats of the Indian midsummer had wearied him of state, and them of prayer in the mosque, or of bargains with the silk-merchant's slaves in the Muchchi Bhawan. “Descending,” we are told, “at early morning, and followed by attendants with fruits and music, the royal party could wander about the labyrinths that honeycomb the fort in this direction, whose windows look on the river at the base of the palace. Arriving at the Baoli they could seat themselves on cushions in the chambers that surrounded the water of the well, and idle away the sultry hours in the manner dwelt on by Persian poets.”

If, indeed, one would realise the pomp and luxury of this ancient Mogul Court, a very just idea may be gained from M. Bernier's account, who visited Agra during the reign of Shah Jehan. In a letter to M. de la Mothe le Vayer, dated July 1, 1663, contemporaneously translated, the Frenchman writes :

“The king appeared sitting upon his throne, in the bottom of the great hall of the Am-kas, splendidly apparelled. His vest was of white satin, flowered and raised with a very fine embroidery of gold and silk. His turban was of cloth of gold, having a fowl wrought upon it like a heron, whose foot was covered with diamonds of an extraordinary bigness and price, with a great Oriental topaz, which may be said to be matchless, shining like a little sun. A collar of big pearls hung about his neck down to his stomach, after the manner that some heathens wear here their great beads. His throne was supported by six high pillars, or feet, said to be of massive gold, and set with rubies, emeralds, and diamonds. I am not able to tell you aright neither the number nor the price of this heap of precious stones, because it is not permitted to come near enough to count them, and to judge of their water and purity. Only this I can say, that the big diamonds are there in confusion, and that the throne is estimated to be worth four kouroures of roupies, if I remember well. I have said elsewhere, that a roupie is almost equivalent to half-a-crown, a lecque to a hundred thousand roupies, and a kourour to a hundred lecques ; so that the throne is valued forty millions of roupies, which are worth about sixty millions of French livres. That which I find upon it best devised are two peacocks covered with precious stones and pearls.

Beneath this throne there appeared all the Omrahs in splendid apparel upon a raised ground covered with a great canopy of purpled gold with great golden fringes, and enclosed by a silver balistre. The pillars of the hall were hung with tapestries of purpled gold, having the ground of gold; and for the roof of the hall there was nothing but great canopies of flowered satin fastened with red silken cords that had big tufts of silk mixed with threads of gold hanging on them. Below there was nothing to be seen but great silken tapestries, very rich, of an extraordinary length and breadth. In the court there was set abroad a curtain tent as long and large as the hall and more. It was joined to the hall by the upper part, and reached almost as far as to the middle of the court; meantime, it was all inclosed by a great balistre covered with plates of silver. It was supported by three pillars, being of the thickness and height of a bargemast, and by some lesser ones, and they all were covered with plates of silver. It was red from without and lined within with those fine chittes, or cloth painted by a pencil of Masulipatam, purposely wrought and contrived with such vivid colours, and flowers so naturally drawn of a hundred several fashions and shapes, that one would have said it were an hanging parterre. Thus was the great hall of the Am-kas adorned and set out. As to those arched galleries which I have spoken of that are round about the courts, each Omrah had received order to dress one of them at his own charges; and, they now striving who should make his own most stately, there was seen nothing but purpled gold above and beneath, and rich tapestries under foot."

Yet, all this while, nothing has been written of the Wonder of Agra, and the "Crown of the World"—the Taj, the Peerless Tomb, built for the fair dead body of Arjamund Banoo Begum by her lord and lover, the Emperor Shah Jehan. In truth, it is difficult to speak of what has been so often described, the charm of which remains nevertheless quite indescribable. As a matter of course, our first hours in Agra were devoted to contemplation of that tender elegy in marble, which by its beauty has made immortal the loveliness that it commemorates. The Tartar princes and princesses from whom sprang the proud line of the Moguls were wont in their lifetime to choose a piece of picturesque ground, to enclose it with high walls, embellish its precincts with flower-beds and groves of shady trees, and to build upon it a Bara-duri, a "twelve-gated" Pleasure House, where they took delight during the founder's life. When he died the pavilion became a mausoleum, and never again echoed with song and music. Perhaps the fair daughter of Asuf-Khan, Shah Jehan's Sultana, had loved this very garden in her life, for her remains were laid, at death, in its confines, while the Emperor commissioned the best artificers of his time to build a resting-place for her dust worthy of the graces of mind and body which are recorded in the Persian verse upon her grave.

In all the world no queen had ever such a monument. You have read a thousand times all about the

Taj; you know exactly—so you believe—what to expect. There will be the gateway of red sandstone with the embroidered sentences upon it from the “Holy Book,” the demi-vault inlaid with flowers and scrolls, then the green garden opening a long vista over marble pavements, between masses of heavy foliage and mournful pillars of the cypress, ranged like sentinels to guard the solemnity of the spot. At the far end of this vista, beyond the fountains and the marble platform, amid four stately white towers, you know what sweet and symmetrical dome will be beheld, higher than its breadth, solid and majestic, but yet soft and delicate in its swelling proportions and its milk-white sheen. Prepared to admire, you are also aware of the defects alleged against the Taj—the rigidity of its outlines, the lack of shadow upon its unbroken front and flanks, and the coloured inlaying said to make it less a triumph of architecture than of Mosaic work, an illustration somewhat too striking and lavish of what is declared of the Moguls, that they “designed like giants, and finished like jewellers.” You determine to judge it dispassionately, not carried away by the remembrance that twenty thousand workmen were employed for twenty-two years in its construction, that it cost hard upon two million pounds sterling, and that gems and precious stones came in camel-loads from all parts of the earth to furnish the inlayers with their material. Then you pass beneath the stately portal—in itself sufficient to commemorate the proudest of princesses—and as the white cupola of the Taj rises before the gaze and reveals its beauty—grace by grace—as you pace along the paved avenue, the mind refuses to criticise what enchants the eye and fills the heart with a sentiment of reverence for the royal love which could thus translate itself into alabaster. If it be time of sunlight the day is softened to perpetual afternoon by the shadows cast from the palms and peepuls, the thuja trees, and the pomegranates, while the hot wind is cooled by the scent of roses and jasmine. If it be moonlight, the dark avenue leads the gaze mysteriously to the soft and lofty splendour of that dome. In either case, when the first platform is reached, and the full glory of this snow-white wonder comes into sight, one can no more stay to criticise its details than to analyse a beautiful face suddenly seen. Admiration, delight, astonishment blend in the absorbed thought with a feeling that human affection never struggled more ardently, passionately, and triumphantly against the oblivion of Death. There is one sustained, harmonious, majestic sorrowfulness of pride in it, from the verse on the entrance which says that “the pure of heart shall enter the Gardens of God,” to the small, delicate letters of sculptured Arabic upon the tombstone which tell, with a refined humility, that Mumtaz-i-Mahal, the “Exalted of the Palace,” lies here, and that “Allah alone is powerful.”

The Garden helps the Tomb, as the Tomb dignifies the Garden. It is such an orderly wilderness of rich vegetation as could only be had in Asia, broad flags of banana belting the dark tangle of banyan and bamboo, with the white pavements gleaming crosswise through the verdure. Yet if the Taj rose amid the sands of a dreary desert, the lovely edifice would beautify the waste, and turn it into a tender parable of the desolation of death, and the power of love, which is stronger than death. You pace round the four sides of the milk-white monument, pausing to observe the glorious prospect over the Indian plains, commanded from the platform on that face where Jumna washes the foot of the wall. Its magnitude now astounds. The plinth of the Taj is over one hundred yards each way, and it lifts its golden pinnacle two hundred and forty-four feet into the sky. From a distance this lovely and aerial dome sits therefore above the horizon like a rounded cloud. And having paced about it, and saturated the mind with its extreme and irresistible loveliness, you enter reverently the burial-place of the Princess Arjamund, to find the inner walls of the monument as much a marvel of subtle shadow and chastened light, decked with delicate jewellery, as the exterior was noble and simple. On the pure surface of this Hall of Death, and upon the columns, panels, and trellis-work of the marble screens surrounding the tomb, are patiently inlaid all sorts of graceful and elaborate embellishments — flowers, leaves, berries, scrolls, and sentences—in jasper, coral, bloodstone, lapis-lazuli, nacre, onyx, turquoise, sardonyx, and even precious gems. Moreover, the exquisite Abode of Death is haunted by spirits as delicate as their dwelling.

THE TAJ MAHAL, AGRA.

They will not answer to rude noises, but if a woman's voice be gently raised in notes of hymn or song, if a chord is quietly sounded, echoes in the marble vault take up the music, repeat, diversify, and amplify it with strange combinations of melodious sounds, slowly dying away and re-arising, as if Israfil, "who has the sweetest voice of all Allah's angels," had set a guard of his best celestial minstrels to watch the death-couch of Arjamund. For, under the beautiful screens and the carved trellis-work of alabaster is the real resting-place of the "Exalted One of the Palace." She has the centre of the circular area, marked by a little slab of snow-white marble; while by her side—a span loftier in height, because he was man and Emperor, but not displacing her from the pre-eminence of her grace and beauty—is the stone which marks the resting-spot of Shah Jehan, her lord and lover. He has immortalised—if he could not preserve alive for one brief day—his peerless wife; yet the pathetic moral of it all is written in a verse hereabouts from the Hudees, or "traditions." It runs—after reciting the styles and titles of "His Majesty, King of Kings, Shadow of Allah, whose Court is as Heaven:"—"Saith Jesus (on whom be peace), This world is a bridge! pass thou over it, but build not upon it! This world is one hour; give its minutes to thy prayers; for the rest is unseen."

XIV.

BENARES AND THE LAND OF THE "LIGHT OF ASIA."

BENARES—the Oxford and the Canterbury of India in one—has been a city of sanctity and learning ages out of mind. Kapila taught the Sânkhya philosophy here, Gautama the Nyaya system, and Panini elaborated his Sanskrit Grammar, although, indeed, the orthodox Brahmans believe that that famous work came straight from the gods centuries before a stone was laid of any Aryan city. Benares, as it stood in ancient days on and about Sarnâth, was certainly older than Alexander of Macedon, for its importance and large population drew thither the Great Teacher of Buddhism, Prince Siddartha, when he had finished his meditations near Gya. Fanciful devotees love to derive its name from Vârânasi, "The Excellent Waters," as though the broad Ganges which laves its temples and ghâts gave the appellation. But this comes undoubtedly from the two streams, Barna and Asi, which bound it on the north and south, and run into the great river.

There are 200,000 souls in the capital of "Kasi," which sits on a high bank sloping abruptly to the water, and is built principally of Chanâr freestone, a material that gives a grey and subdued hue to its long sweeping crescent of ghâts, temples, stairways, and quays; to a Hindu's eye the noblest and holiest panorama in the world.

No one, indeed, who has ever gazed upon that vast hill of hallowed architecture can afterwards forget the aspect of the sacred city—as it rises from the shore of the Ganges in a league-long front of countless shrines and crowded bathing-places. The best plan is to take boat and pass along the broad channel from Tulsi to Ram Ghât and back again. The city presents to the view one unbroken bank of pinnacles, shrines, pillared mandirs, chaityas, pilgrim houses, towers, sacred trees, images, altars, and flights of spacious steps. Every other spot in this chaos of consecrated sites is the scene of some reputed miracle, ancient or modern. At Rao Sahib Ghât, for instance, lies a vast effigy of Bhima, which, if you believe the Brahmans, is annually washed away by the river, to be brought punctually back again. At the Kedar Ghât is the wonderful "Well of Gauri," which will cure all diseases, particularly dysentery. In a tank close by is the Mansarovar Stone, which grows daily by the breadth of a millet-seed. At Bhairava Ghât they sell peacock fans warranted to wave away all evil spirits; hard by is a goddess with a silver face, who infallibly protects from small-pox; and between the Bisheshwar Temple and a mosque which Aurungzebe, the Destroyer, made out of shattered Hindu and Buddhist temples, is the Dnyan Kûp, or "Well of Knowledge," a fetid, dark hole, full of decaying votive wreaths, where Shiva Himself has the ill-taste to dwell. Then come the shrine of Annapurna, Goddess of Plenty, who never allows famine to visit Benares; and Shunkareshwar's chapel, where wives pray successfully for handsome boys; together with the supremely holy Mani Varnika, a spot at which Devi the Divinest One dropped her earring in the well, and Charan-padak, where the feet of Vishnu have plainly impressed a circular slab rising from the pavement. These are but a very few amid the perfect wilderness of consecrated localities, thronging and jostling each other along the steep northern rim of the river, tier rising over tier in a confused mass of domes, spires, arches, halls, and walls, making up a silvery, sun-lighted eminence of masonry, brickwork, and stucco, diversified with all sorts of colours, with red or blue and bronzed, lacquered and gilt cupolas—with palaces, some new and splendid, some mouldering and shabby—Nepalese, Jain, and Muslim edifices mingling strange elements with the prodigious melange of Hindu architecture.

Yet, far and away the most remarkable part of the spectacle presented by the river-face of the city is its population, resident and immigrant. Throughout the length of this northern shore, where the flights of steps and the slopes of the temples come down to the Ganges, is seen all day long an immense crowd of devotees, of all ages, ranks, and raiment, and of both sexes, bathing in the sacred river or praying by its edge, or washing their robes of pilgrimage, or bringing their dead to be burned. Imagine what an artistic effect results from such a fringe of life and of colour between the steep multi-coloured background of the steps and temples and the shining waters of the stream! Throngs of brown-skinned men and women, of boys and girls, stand waist-deep along the bathing stations, whispering their supplications and pouring the holy liquid over neck and breast and loosened black hair. Groups of bright-clad women, led by their Brahman gurus, trip joyously down the stairs from far-off towns and jungles, to lay their scarlet, saffron, green, and rose-colour saris aside with the Ghât-keepers, and wash their innocent sins away in Gunga. Big umbrellas are everywhere erected in the sand or mud, inscribed with "Ram, Ram," and under them, shaded from the sun, family parties sit and chatter, or pray in silent accord, arrived, after immense marches, to be laved in and saved by Gunga. Sick people lie, wistful and wan, on charpoys, brought to her beneficent side, that they may hear the ripple of the "Great Mother," and feel the healing wind blow from her waves; while, at the foot of the burning Ghâts, where the people who sell the "death-wood" are raking for white bones in the heaps of hot ashes, and piling up fuel and cow-dung for their next batch of funeral-pyres, lie three still figures covered with white and red cloths, from which protrude only the fixed cold feet, washed by the outer edge of the tide. These are the Dead of to-day, happy—thrice happy—to have passed to the Gate of Swarga, close to Gunga's good waves. Their friends sit near, well satisfied even amid their natural regrets; and, very soon, three blue curls of smoke wafted among the temple-roofs from three crackling fires upon the platform of the Ghât will tell where those quiet votaries have finished their pilgrimage once and for all. Wonderful is the fervour of belief among these gentle metaphysical Hindu people! An orthodox British Churchwoman will feel that she has done her duty if, when she visits a famous city, she goes twice to its ancient cathedral on Sunday. What would she think of these Indian wives and mothers visiting a score of temples, and bathing with such rejoicing confidence of salvation in a crowd under the Dasaswamedha Ghât? Some of them are "purdah women," who would never lay aside their veils and step outside the curtain except under protection of the sacred simplicity of pilgrimage. Some are old and feeble, weary with long journeys of life, emaciated by maladies, saddened from losses and troubles; and the morning air blows sharp, the river wave runs chilly. Yet there they stand, breast-deep in the cold river, with dripping cotton garments clinging to their thin or aged limbs, visibly shuddering under the shock of the water, and their lips blue and quivering, while they eagerly mutter their invocations. None of them hesitates; into Gunga they plunge on arrival, ill or well, robust or sickly; and ladle the holy liquid up with small, dark, trembling hands, repeating the sacred names, and softly mentioning the sins they would expiate and the beloved souls they plead for! I hope it is really true, as I watch these devout and shivering women, that "all the prayers which are uttered come somehow to the ears of Keshav."

THE MOSQUE AND GHATS, BENARES.

A BURNING-GHAT, BENARES.

I took a most interesting walk through the city on the day after our voyage upon the river, in the agreeable society of a Jain gentleman of high rank and many accomplishments, the Raja Sivaprasâd, C.S.I. The Raja received me in a spacious garden, ornamented with fountains and arbours of climbing flower-plants, situated on the outskirts of the city. He is a good Sanskrit and Arabic scholar, and deeply versed in the philosophies and histories of his country; while a long experience in public affairs has added practical sagacity to the kindly disposition and gentle tenets characteristic of the Svetambara Jains, whose beliefs are closely akin to Buddhism. The Raja is the principal native personage of Benares, after the Maharajah, and illustrates in his amiable household the tolerant spirit of modern Hinduism, his wife being a Vaishnavite, and his sister a Jain like himself. We drove through the chief bazaars of the city as far as a carriage can go. This is not a long way, for all along the edge of the river-slope the holy metropolis becomes a labyrinth of narrow lanes, where even a palanquin can hardly pass. Threading these on foot, amid a crowd of townsmen, pilgrims, sacred bulls and cows, flower and shrine sellers, gosains, priests, and brightly clad women, we first visited the house of a very wealthy banker and merchant. Followed by two armed servants, the Raja tripped familiarly into the abode, and calling aloud

"Malek bolâta ?"—"Does the Master summon?"—led the way upstairs to the sanctum of our Hindu capitalist. After pleasant conversation upon the state of trade, a door covered with silver plates and studs was opened with three keys, and the little apartment became inundated by a dazzling flood of gold and silk keincobs, embroidered cloths and scarves, cashmere shawls of marvellous make, texture, and tints, slippers for princesses, turbans for kings, and cholis glittering with gems and gold lace; while from the same receptacle "the wealth of Ormuz and of Ind" was suddenly and splendidly illustrated by the production of a whole heap of necklaces, armlets, bangles, and chains of the most costly jewels. Benares is always rich, because good Hindus—when they have amassed a fortune—come hither to end their days, bringing their gold mohurs and rupees with them. But it has only been under the strong British Raj that a Hindu merchant can thus safely store up and display his opulence!

Once more in the street, we wandered through a maze of shops and shrines, the latter so numerous that there really appeared to be more temples than houses in Benares. We entered many a famous fane—where Mahadeo, or Parvati, or Gunpati sate in more or less ugly sanctity, amid a swarm of fervent worshippers and sacred but intrusive bulls. Perhaps the most curious was a little out-of-the-way "temenos" into which the Benares ladies were constantly passing with offerings, while nobody went by its gate without stopping to pay a lowly obeisance. Within the dark adytum, to which we were readily admitted, was a stone figure of the seated Buddha, bearing the established inscription, Yad dharma hetu, &c., beneath it, and this was being devoutly adored by the married women as an orthodox Hindu deity who could insure them handsome offspring! In many places, indeed, about the city there may be observed, built into walls or adopted as ornaments of temples, relics of the Buddhism which for eight hundred years had a chief seat here; but this was the only instance where Sakya-Muni was actually worshipped. The incident led to interesting conversations with some of the priests, who seem for the most part free enough from bigotry, and true Vedantists, i.e., Theists or Pantheists, at bottom. My Jain friend and I passed unhindered into the presence of many of the most sacred divinities, occasionally presenting a small offering to the guardian Brahmans, who are grown so reasonable that the Municipal Commissioners have even been able to deport most of the troublesome red monkeys from the Durgâ Kund Temple into the jungles on the other side of the river. They gave me flower wreaths from the necks of their idols, and smiled assent when I said that no "Twice-Born" who had read his Bhagavad-Gîta could believe in stone Mahadeos and wooden Gunpatis, except as symbols.

Arrived at last through all this labyrinth of Asiatic theology upon a spot near the Burning Ghât, where another little group of dead lay silently, with their rigid feet laved by the running water, I asked, rather abruptly, "Did these live before their recent existence, Raja, and will Heaven grant them to live again?" The good Jain settled himself against a carved pillar of Aurungzebe's mosque, and quoted in Sanskrit those lines of the great Bhagavad-Gîta, which say :

"He is unknown to whoso think they know ;
And known to whoso know they know Him not."

"There is the metaphysical and there is the practical answer," he went on, "which will you have? The true truth in all languages transcends expression! No words can compass what the informed soul knows and feels; but for work-a-day purposes it is enough to believe—as we Jains do—that the life of these dead men was the outcome of former births, and that as they have passed this existence well or ill so must their next life be surely moulded." The Raja was, in fact, full of delightful stories and deep philosophies. As we made way for a poor cripple at a temple gate, whom the throng would have shut out, he told me of a rebuke administered to Sher Shah by the Muslim poet Mâlik Muhammad. The Emperor, hearing of this verse-writer's renown, sent for him to Court. The poet came—a man of genius, but a weaver by trade—poor, mean in aspect, with a grotesque face, and eyes that squinted. Sher Shah broke into a loud laugh of ridicule at the unprepossessing appearance of the minstrel, upon which Mâlik Muhammad said gravely and sweetly, "Do you laugh, oh, my lord! at the Creator or at what He has created?"

Yet it is not Hinduism which—to my mind, at least—chiefly consecrates Benares. The divine memory of the founder of Buddhism broods over all the country hereabouts; and just as the walls and buildings of "Kasi" are full of old Buddhist stones carved with symbols and legends of his gentle faith, so is the land north and south famous with the passage of his feet, and so are the religious and social thoughts and ways of all this Hindu people stamped with the impress of his doctrines. Modern Brahmanism is really Buddhism in a Shastri's robe and sacred thread. Shunkurachârya and his priests expelled the brethren of the yellow robe from India, but the spirit of Sakya-Muni's teaching remained unbanished, just as

"Greece, overcome, conquered her conqueror."

For this reason the country of "The Light of Asia" and the monuments which remain in India of ancient Buddhism ought surely to be esteemed more interesting than the most ornate Brahmanic temples, or the proudest and most beautiful mosques and palaces of the Mogul. And all the country of the Buddhist chronicles may be visited within a week by one who would see where Prince Siddârtha was born and dwelled in his Pleasure-House; where he meditated his doctrines during six years, and where he publicly taught them; and where his body was burned. It all lies, roughly speaking, inside the three or four hundred miles between Busti in Oudh and Buddha-Gya in the Lower Provinces, which tract, varying somewhat in scenery and races, includes four sites, more important and absorbing in regard of what may be called "Religious Geography" than Mount Hira, where the Prophet received commission to write his Koran, or Paniput, where the Bhagavad-Gîta was recited; nay, approaching—if one may say so—in deep human import the sacred sites of Palestine itself, since Buddhism, justly understood, is in certain aspects an Asiatic Christianity, having thrice as many votaries as any other creed.

The four sites alluded to are Bhûila, which is the ancient Kapila-vastu, the place of his birth; Kasia, that of his death; Sarnâth, near Benares, which is the ancient Isipatana, where he preached; and Buddha-Gya, where—upon a spot known to a rood, to a yard, of ground—this lofty and tender teacher elaborated in solitude that statement of belief which, rightly comprehended, is so full of love, of hope, of peace, and of philosophic truth. Bhûila, now almost certainly identified with Kapila-vastu by the admirable labours of Mr. Carlyle, General Cunningham, and others, is to-day a tangle of brick and stone ruins, where gaps in the mound which was once a city wall mark the gates whereby Siddârtha rode forth to contend with the Sakya princes for the love of Yasôdhara, and to witness those sights of age, sickness, and death which filled his heart with "the still, sad music of humanity." There are to this day, in that district, the lakes from which he drank; the fields where he watched the labours of the Indian spring-time; the jungle where the Jambu tree shaded his princely head; the villages of Asita, of Supprabuddha, of Devadatta, and, most significant of all, that distant view of the ranges of Himalaya, which, it may be believed, lifted his soul to lofty thoughts, by the majesty and mystery of the shining peaks, which seem at once to shut in the world, and to supply a pathway to heaven. From his earthly paradise in that spot beyond the Gogra the young prince fled; and one may identify and ride over the Anoma river, which he crossed on his way southward; and traverse the vast flats of jungle, desolate with sandy patches, or rank with wild indigo, tiger grass, and thorn-bushes, which his patient feet trod.

The charm of the Indian jungle has never been adequately described. There are districts where it is almost terrible in its wildness of savage luxuriance, where masses of dank and poisonous trees are knitted into an impenetrable shade by snaky creepers, and the fever in the hot moist air seems present like a visible evil genius, like an Asura, lurking to slay its victims, as the leopard does on the branch of the black sâl tree, and the cobra under the beautiful deadly blossoms of the datura. And, again, there are tracts of delightful wilderness in India, where no plough has touched the sterile, yet lovely, landscape since its levels were laid. To wander here on the smooth sand and rock, between clumps of self-planted korunda and jujube; to taste the pure warm air sighing across its maidans, to follow the shadowed hollows and painted banks of the nullah and come suddenly upon the lonely reed-fringed jheel, full of crimson and blue lotuses and crowded by water-birds, is the pleasantest of lonely wandering. In these natural, and delicious solitudes of Asia, which have never known the hand—scarcely even the foot—of man, the spirit of the dreamy, placid, metaphysical East seems to brood over the silence, that spirit which Shelley embodies in the “Prometheus Unbound:”

“Asia ! thou Light of Life !
Shadow of beauty unbeheld !”

And amid these wild gardens of the great Peninsula you may study as you roam all the classical objects of Aryan Natural History, as the Mahābhārata and Kalidasa describe them. The Koil will utter its flute-like notes from the thicket; the peacocks break from the kusa grass, a storm of green, and purple, and gold; the sand-grouse, whose cry is heard before the bird is visible in the sky, skims to the pool, where the white egrets and the cranes are stalking, and over which the “fish-tiger” hovers; the bee-bird hawks for butterflies; the “nine sisters” chatter in the thorn-bushes; the antelopes file in graceful beauty across the plain; and, as evening falls, you hear the chakur and chakri, “which live on moonbeams, and which only death can separate,” cheeping to the rising crescent; while the jackals steal out to find food, and the flying foxes unhook their leathern pinions from the neem tree, and scream as they launch themselves on the dusky air to plunder the distant village fruit-groves.

Through such a country it was my happiness to track the passage of Sakya-Muni step by step, as he wandered from his palace near the lakes at Busti towards the Ganges Valley and the hills surrounding Gya. After his attainment of the Buddhahood, almost the first spot in which he declared "the Law" was the "Deer Park," near Benares, called in the ancient writings "Isipatan." This may be very easily visited from Benares. The road leads for three or four miles out of the cantonments, past the old residence of Warren Hastings, and over the river Barna, under avenues of fig trees and bamboos, until a sudden turn brings you—after a further ride of a mile and a half—to a well-cultivated plain, where two prominent objects rise above the face of the country. One is an abrupt little hill, topped by a square building, the hill being a mass of ruined brickwork, and the turret a comparatively modern erection. But within sight of it, elevated above the trees and bamboo-clumps through which the road approaches, come abruptly into view the massive outlines of a Buddhist Stupa, resembling no other kind of monument in the world. It soars aloft, 80 or 90 feet high, shaped, in its present broken outlines, like a martello tower of masonry, having on its summit another and smaller turret of red bricks. The lower structure is circular, and formed of large blocks of square-cut sandstone of a russet tinge, the sweep of its surface being diversified by seven slightly projecting entablatures, reaching from the swell at its base nearly to the crown of the larger tower, and each containing a niche which, doubtless, once held a gilded Buddha. Round the central zone runs a belt of carving—lotus flowers and scrolls—boldly but excellently wrought wherever finished, although certain parts remain incomplete, and you can see where the last strokes of the mason's graver were suspended. The upper structure is of flat ruddy bricks, much broken by time, and topped with a waving growth of grass and flowers; but probably this was once coated with plaster, and surrounded by a coronet of pilasters. The Stupa, in its entirety, with the band of graceful sculpture girdling it, its ring of seated golden Buddhas, and its solid-columned top, must have looked grandly in the days when Asoka, or some Buddhist king, reared it—about the date of the first Punic war. Even now it is an imposing pile, dominating the land near and far with its rugged mass, and scattering over the plain for a furlong around its débris of brick and carved stones. Nevertheless, that which it commemorates, and the landscape of which it is the centre, are what most absorb the attention. Here the wise Indian prince taught the Law with his unalterable sweetness and pity. Upon these fields, and fair groves, and grassy hollows, his mild eyes gazed, while the people and their lords gathered eagerly around him to learn deliverance from ignorance and Vedic tyrannies. This was the "Deer Park," this was "Isipatana," to which he repaired from the banks of the Phalgu to declare the new wisdom: for there are stones here, to this hour, marked in Asoka characters by the ancient masons with "Isi——" and "Isipa—," denoting their destination, and all the world of Buddhism knows Sarnâth to be the place where "The Light of Asia" shed its earliest beams. As I sate on the ramp of the great Stupa, surrounded by a friendly crowd of naked Hindu children pleasantly chatting, with birds and beasts fearlessly approaching us, and the bright peace of an Indian afternoon irradiating the groves and fields, it seemed as if more consecrated ground could hardly anywhere be found!

BUDDHIST STUPA AT SARNATH, BENARES.

CARVING ON TOWER AT SARNATH.

After some days spent in Benares we followed further the steps of "the Master," as he first wandered down from Kapila-vastu to the Ganges Valley, near Patna, and thence to Rajagriha and Buddha Gya.

Leaving Patna, or Bankipore, the road leads for about sixty miles through a level country covered with rice-fields to Gya, the ancient Rajagriha, or "King's House," where Bimbasara reigned. We reached this town at night, and I rose at daybreak next morning with much pleasant anxiety to view and identify those landmarks of the neighbourhood in which the Great Teacher dwelled during six years, and where he put a stop to the cruel sacrifices, and passed daily with his begging-bowl. "Round Rajagriha five fair hills arise." There, in the distance, they were! Bipula, with its stream and crags; Ratna-giri; Gridhakuta, still swarming with vultures, as its name implies; Sona-giri, "the Golden Hill;" and most memorable of all, Baibhâra, with its hot springs, which has on its northern extremity at Jarasandh-ki-baithak, the veritable cavern wherein Sakya-Muni lived, and near at hand, that of Sôn-Bhândâr, wherein the great Buddhist Convention assembled three months after his death. The ancient town of Rajagriha, with its five hills, lay some miles away from the position of modern Gya, but close to this latter is Mora, the Pragbôdhi mountain, containing the "cave of which Fa Hian writes: "Going north-east half a yojana from this we arrived at a stone cell, into which Bodhisatwa, entering, sat down with his legs crossed, and his face toward the west. Whilst thus seated he reflected—'If I am to arrive at the condition of perfect wisdom, then let there be some spiritual manifestation.' Immediately on the stone wall there appeared a shadow of Buddha, in length somewhat about three feet. This shadow is still distinctly visible. Then the heavens and the earth were greatly shaken, so much so that all the Devas resident in space cried out and said—'This is not the place appointed for the Buddhas, past or those to come, to arrive at perfect wisdom.' All that was after he had lived for some time in the cavern upon Baibhâra, which General Cunningham—whom I have since had the privilege to meet—discovered in the remarkable way thus narrated in the official records: "Two points in the description led me to the discovery of the cave I was in search of, which was quite unknown to the people. Close to the hot-springs, on the north-east slope of the Baibhâra hill, there is a massive foundation of a stone house, eighty-five feet square, called Jarasandh-ki-baithak, or 'Jarâsandhas' throne.' Now, as Jarâsandha was an Asura, it struck me that the cave should be looked for in the immediate vicinity of the stone foundation. I proceeded from the bed of the stream straight to the baithak, a distance of 289 paces, which agrees with the 300 paces noted by Fa Hian. Seated on the baithak itself, I looked around, but could see no trace of any cave; and neither the officiating Brahmans at the hot-springs, nor the people of the village, had ever heard of one. After a short time my eye caught a large mass of green immediately behind the stone basement. On pushing aside some of the branches with a stick I found that they belonged to trees growing in a hole, and not to mere surface brushwood.

I then set men to cut down the trees and clear out the hollow. A flight of steps was first uncovered, then a portion of the roof, which was still unbroken; and before the evening we had partially cleared out a large cave, forty feet in length by thirty feet in width. This, then, was the Pippal, or Vaibhara cave, of the Chinese pilgrims, in which Buddha had actually dwelt and taken his meals. The identification is fully confirmed by the relative position of the other cave, called Sôn-Bhândâr, which corresponds exactly with the account given by Fa Hian. In a direct line the distance between the two caves is only 3000 feet, but to go from one to the other it is necessary to descend the hill again to the bed of the stream, and then to ascend the stream to the Sôn-Bhândâr cave, which increases the distance to about 4500 feet, or rather more than 5 li. The Sôn-Bhândâr cave was therefore beyond all doubt the famous Sattapani cave of the Buddhists, in which the first synod was held in 478 B.C., three months after the death of Buddha."

Yet, the most hallowed spot of all this sacred ground is certainly Buddha-Gya, where, under the Bôdhi tree, the sun of Truth rose for Prince Siddârtha. You pass along the banks of Phalgu to the point where the two streams of Lilâjan and Mohâna unite to form that river, traversing a sandy but fertile valley full of sâl trees, jujubes, figs, and bamboos. The sunny hills look down on the broad shining channel; the peaceful people sit at their hut-doors winding their Tusseh silk cocoons, or draw the palm wine from the toddy trees, or herd upon the plains great droves of milch cattle and black sheep. Underneath the shady topes move the forest-creatures of the Buddha story, in that amity which he created between them and man—the striped squirrel, the doves (pearl-colour and blue), the koil, the parroquet, the kingfisher, the quail, and the myna. Especially does the sacred Fig Tree flourish in the neighbourhood—not the aswattha, which sends down aerial roots and makes fresh trunks, but the Peepul, the sacred Fig, under the shade of which Siddartha triumphed over doubt.

After five miles of this pleasant passage the village of Buddha-Gya is reached, and a short walk from the road brings one suddenly in view of a lofty temple built in tiers or stages, and adorned with seated figures of Buddha. This is the great central shrine of the Gentle Faith; the Mecca of Buddhism. The tower, built of bricks, faced with white chunam, rises out of an extensive square excavation to the height of 160 or 170 feet, with eight rows of niches belting its diminishing pinnacle, which is crowned with a golden finial, in the shape of an ammalaka fruit. All around it, in this sunken square, are stupas and viharas, large and small—shrines and memorials—with rows of broken sculptures and inscribed stones dug up from the vicinity of the temple. Inside the adytum of the temple is a seated Buddha, gilt and inscribed, before which were fluttering numberless gilded ribbons; while the granite floor was carved with votive inscriptions, and desecrated in the middle, by the Brahmans who have usurped the place, with a stone Lingam. Southwest of the temple—which doubtless remains much as Hwen Thsang saw it in A.D. 637—is a raised square platform, and on one corner of this, its trunk and branches adorned with leaf-gold and coloured here and there with red ochre, stands the present representative of the famous Bôdhi tree, replacing the many successors of that under which, according to the Mahawanso, “the Divine Sage achieved the Supreme, All-perfect Buddhahood.” The present tree is a flourishing little peepul, thick with dark, glossy, pointed leaves, from which the Brahman priest, who was reciting the names of Siva to a party of pilgrims, readily—too readily, indeed!—gave me a bunch. I should have been better pleased if he had resented my request; but Buddha is unknown and unhonoured upon his own ground by the Sivaites, although it is His name which has made the place famous, and which brings there countless pilgrims. It was strange to see these votaries of Mahâdeo rolling sacrificial cakes—pindas—and repeating mantras on the spot where Sakya-Muni attained so much higher religious insight! Around the hollow are clustered gardens and huts, and immediately encircling the temple itself is a railing of sandstone, the most ancient relic of the site—almost, indeed, the most antique memorial of all India; for, besides its old-world carvings of fabulous animals, and lotus blossoms, the massive fence of masonry bears Asoka inscriptions, and must be at least twenty centuries old. A Burmese tablet is set up in the Mahant’s college, close by, which says: "This is the chief of the 84,000 shrines erected by Dharma Asoka, ruler of the earth, at the close of the 218th year of Buddha's Nirvana, upon the holy spot where our Lord tasted the milk and honey."

Since then the original fane has been patched, repaired, and renovated, but not apparently very greatly altered in outline or character from Asoka's own work. Ages of neglect had covered its base with débris, from which it is now cleared again, and will be protected for the future with more or less satisfactory reverence. Yet painful it certainly is, to one who realises the immense significance of this spot in the history of Asia and of humanity, to wander round the precincts of the holy tree, and to see scores and hundreds of broken sculptures lying about in the jungle or on the brick-heaps, some delicately carved with incidents of the Buddha legend, some bearing clear and precious inscriptions in early or later characters. In the garden of a little house near the platform and the fane I saw numberless beautiful broken stones tossed aside, cut into Buddhas and Bodhisats with a skill often quite admirable; while in a shed adjoining was a whole pile of selected fragments—five or six cartloads—lying in dust and darkness, the very first of which, when examined, bore the Buddhist formula of faith, and the second was an exquisite bas-relief of Buddha illustrating the incident of the mad elephant who worshipped him. I have since appealed to the Government of India and to all enlightened Hindu gentlemen, by a public letter, against such sad neglect of the noblest locality in all their Indian philosophic annals ; and I cherish the hope of seeing the temple and its precincts—which are all Government property—placed under the guardianship of Buddhists. But whether the temple and its relics be preserved with proper reverence or not, neither bigotry, Brahmanism, nor time can ever destroy the inherent sanctity of the scene, or diminish the spell which broods over that memorable landscape. Here, in the sunken plain which looks southwards to Shergoti and northwards to Gya—here, where the dark-green peepul is still the chief of the forest trees, and Phalgu trickles in her wide bed under the rocky hills, the greatest Thinker of ancient times rose from his long meditations of love and pity to proclaim ideas which have moulded the life and religions of Asia, and modified a hundred Asiatic histories ! What site—even in India, so rich with monuments and shrines—can be compared for imperishable associations with this of the little Fig Tree at Buddha-Gya, under whose shade I passed the afternoon of a perfect day, while pilgrims trooped into Asoka's temple, close at hand, and the dreamy brilliancy of the sunshine and the placid industries of the happy villagers brought to mind that Nirvana which is not annihilation, but the unspeakable perfected state beyond all such existence as our senses can know—that peace of heaven which “passeth all understanding :” that eternal refuge from the evils of being, “where the silence lives !”

XV.

THE "CITY OF PALACES" AND MADRAS.

It is a mistake to think that the snakes are always harmless which are brought round to house doors and hotels in India by the jugglers and samp-wallahs. An almost universal opinion exists that these men extract the poison-fangs from the serpents kept in their baskets, and that anybody, therefore, may approach and play with them as freely as their exhibitors. This is by no means the case. Many of the reptiles which hiss and coil about in the Indian verandahs are as deadly as any to be found in the jungle. The conjuring people tame and familiarise their snakes, especially the cobras, which are then disinclined to strike, and become quite playful and friendly; so that, unless suddenly frightened or irritated, they dart at the hand of the snake-charmer without erecting the poison-fangs or even opening their mouths. It would, however, be different and very dangerous if a stranger trifled with some of those basketed serpents, and the samp-wallahs themselves occasionally fall victims to the recklessness or confidence with which they handle their captures. The Maharajah of Benares was kind enough to send the entire company of his palacejugglers for our entertainment. They performed with much adroitness the usual series of Hindu tricks. They made the mango-tree grow and bear ripe fruit from a seed; swallowed fire and swords; disentangled inextricable knots; and, having mixed together in water and drunk up three powders, red, green, and yellow, one of them brought what seemed the same powders forth from his mouth in a dry state again. Then they produced a large selection of snakes, of which three were cobras, and one of these was made to dance to the gourd and bansula, striking again and again meanwhile at the hand of the performer. A doubt being expressed by somebody as to the lethal power of this creature, the chief juggler declared it was truly a dant-wallah, and had his poison teeth. "If the saheb-lók would supply a sheep or goat, they might quickly see whether he spoke a true word." Eventually a white chicken was produced, and seizing his cobra by the neck, the juggler pinched its tail, and made it bite the poor fowl, which uttered a little cry when the sharp tooth punctured its thigh. But, being replaced on the ground, the chicken began to pick up rice with unconcern, apparently uninjured. In about four minutes, however, it ceased moving hither and thither, and began to look sick. In two minutes more it had dropped its beak upon the ground, and was evidently paralysed, and unable to breathe freely. In another minute it fell over upon its side, and was dead with convulsions within ten minutes after the infliction of the wound. At Pahlampur, a snake-charmer for whom we sent to catch a serpent, said to be infesting the compound, had just died by a bite from one of his own captive snakes.

JUGGLERS AT BENARES.

The fact is snakes are not understood, and especially cobras. They are extremely intelligent, slow to anger, conscious of their terrible venom, and loath to employ it. The striking teeth in the cobra are always half-erect, and not more than a quarter of an inch long; they are grooved, and it is the gum which presses the poison into them, not the special gland; which, however, exists, of course, but which these serpents are very backward in discharging. They are easily tamed, are anxious to escape notice, but extraordinarily sensible to kindness, and when not frightened are among the most gentle and attached of creatures. I shall print in this place an unpublished poem written by me some time ago, which illustrates the topic:

THE SNAKE AND THE BABY.

"In sin conceived," you tell us, "condemned for the guilt of birth,"
From the moment when, lads and lasses, they come to this sorrowful earth;
And the rose-leaf hands, and the limpid eyes, and the blossom-mouths learning to kiss Mean nothing, my good Lord Bishop! which, anyway, shakes you in this?

Well, I—I believe in babies! from the dawn of a day in Spring
When, under the neems, in my garden, I saw a notable thing, Long ago, in my Indian garden. 'Twas a morning of gold and grey,
And the Sun—as you never see him—had melted the last stars away.

My Arab, before the house-door, stood stamping the gravel to go,
 All wild for his early gallop ; and you heard the caw of the crow,
 And the " nine little sisters " a-twitter in the thorn-bush ; and,
     farther away,
 The coppersmiths' stroke in the fig-tree, awaking the squirrels to play.

My foot was raised to the stirrup, and the bridle gathered. What made Syce Gopal stare straight before him, with visage fixed and dismayed ?
 What made him whisper in terror—" O Shiva ! the snake ! the snake !"
 I looked where Gopal was looking, and felt my own heart quake !

For there—in a patch of sunlight—where the path to the well went down,
 The year-old baby of Gopal sate naked, and soft, and brown,
 His small right arm encircling a lota of brass, his left Close-cuddling a great black cobra, just creeping forth from a cleft !

We held our breaths ! The serpent drew clear its lingering tail
 As we gazed ; you could see its dark folds and silvery belly trail Tinkling the baby's bangles, and climbing his thigh and his breast,
 As it glided beneath the fingers on those cold scales fearlessly pressed.

He was crowing—that dauntless baby !—while the lank black Terror squeezed Its muzzle, and throat, and shoulders, 'twixt his stomach and arm ! Well pleased
 He was hard at play with his serpent, pretending to guard the milk,
 And stroking that grewsome playmate with palms of nut-brown silk !

Alone, untended, and helpless, he was cooing low to the snake ;
 Which coiled and clung about him, even more (as it seemed) for the sake

Of the touch of his velvety body, and the love of his laughing eyes,
 And the flowery clasp of his fingers, than to make the milk a prize.

For, up to the boy's face mounting, we saw the cobra dip
 His wicked head in the lota, and drink with him, sip for sip;
 Whereat, with a chuckle, that baby pushed off the serpent's head,
 And—look!—the red jaws opened, and the terrible hood was spread!

And Gopal muttered beside me "Ah, Saheb! wah, Saheb!" to see
 The forked tongue glance at the infant's neck, and the spectacled devilry
 Of the broad crest dancing and darting all round that innocent brow;
 Yet it struck not; but, quietly closing its jaws and its hood, laid now

The horrible mottled murder of its mouth in the tender chink
 Of the baby's plump crossed limblets; while peacefully he did drink
 What breakfast-milk he wanted, then held the lota down For the snake to finish at leisure, plunged deep in it, fang and crown.

Three times, before they parted, my Syce would have sprung to the place,
 In fury to smite the serpent; but I held him fast; for one pace
 Had been death to the boy! I knew it! and I whispered, "Gopal, wait!"
 "*Chooprao! * he is wiser than we are; he has never yet learned to* hate!"

Then, coil by coil, the cobra unwound its glistering bands, Sliding—all harmless and friendly—from under the baby's hands;
 Who crowed, as his comrade left him, in baby-language to say "Good-bye! for this morning, Serpent! come very soon back to play!"

So I thought, as I mounted "Wurdah," and galloped the Maidan thrice,
 "Millennium's due to-morrow, by 'baby and cockatrice!'"
 And I never can now believe it, my Lord! that we come to this earth Ready-damned, with the seeds of evil sown quite so thick at our birth!

Lest any one should think this fanciful, I may cite the case mentioned by Lady Falkland of a Bheel boy in Khandeish. He was found by his mother playing with wild snakes, and it was proved that he had the gift of attracting and taming all kinds of them. He would sit near the jungle and utter a peculiar cry which brought cobras, daboiyas, and rock serpents out from the bushes, to cluster round him and wreath themselves about his neck and limbs. A Brahman lad also at Wae, near Sattara, exhibited the same power, so much so that he became the prodigy of the country-side, and thousands flocked to see him, believing him an avatar of Krishna. Both these boys perished at last of a snake-bite, as many of the samp-wallahs do. But Hindus know the possibility of such friendships, and partly from fear, partly from wonder, they still deeply reverence the snake. If one be killed, some will solemnly burn or bury it, begging its spirit to excuse the deed. To see cobras in congress—at which time, strange to say, they balance themselves erect upon their tails—is the most fortunate of omens, and if you can touch them at that moment with a cloth, it becomes representative of Lakshmi and immeasurably sacred. A Hindu who is ill often makes a serpent of brass or clay, like the ancient Israelites, and worships it, to become well again. A snake visiting a house is called "uncle," and treated as a most honoured guest; for are not their tongues split, because they licked the amrita, the food of immortality, from the sharp kusa grass, and how shall the Hindu be rude to creatures that can never really die? Above all they are most sensitive to the charms of music, and it is no fable that snakes will come forth to the sound of the flute or beaded gourd. They are thought to haunt places where treasure is buried; and attach themselves to persons and houses where they are kindly treated—never seeking to injure, unless suddenly frightened. The real truth, therefore, is that snake-charmers trust to familiarity and their knowledge of the moods of the cobra, rather than to disarming them. When the serpent is very angry his mouth fills with the venom, and any tooth in his jaw, if it scratches, will poison.

In coming down from Benares to Calcutta we passed near to the picturesque, but ill-omened, river Kurrumnassa, from the water of which no high-caste native, though ever so thirsty, will drink. Its name is in Sanskrit Karma-nashā, the "destroyer of deeds," and its legend is a curious instance of the superstitions yet surviving in India. The Kurrumnassa enters the Ganges at Chausa, flowing by Mirzapore from the hills; but the orthodox say it came into existence by reason of the sin of Raja Trisang. He had killed a cow, murdered a Brahman, and married his stepmother —offences beyond all forgiveness, had not his repentance been so earnest that the gods, in pity at last of so contrite a sinner, took water from all the rivers in the world, and, making the Kurrumnassa with them, bade the Raja wash away his guilt in its waves? The threefold crime was thus purged, but the stream is supposed still to bear in its contaminated current the evil of such heinous deeds, and not a lota of any Brahman or Kshatrya woman is ever dipped into it, nor will the pious Hindu cross it except by a bridge.

Calcutta has been called the "City of Palaces," and presents, no doubt, a stately front of buildings and residences, viewed from the expanse of its grassy esplanade, which is about the finest piece of open ground possessed by any capital. Numerous and well-kept roads traverse this broad playground of the Indian capital, and whether you look inland to the white and yellow houses, backed by the palms, or across its surface to the crowded masts upon the Hooghly, the prospect is proud and metropolitan; the saffron-coloured domes and sweeping façades of Government House being from all points conspicuous. It must be allowed also that the climate of the capital of British India is very delightful in the cold season; the mornings cool, the noons bright yet not oppressive, and the evenings almost chilly. In Lord Dufferin's study there was a lively wood fire at tiffin-time on January 21. One finds, moreover, as a matter of course, excellent society in Calcutta, especially when the Governor-General resides there; and clubs, libraries, cricket-fields, gardens, tennis-grounds, theatres, and endless social entertainments make time pass pleasantly enough. Yet the native town is decidedly unattractive—the bazaars are commonplace and inconveniently crowded—and the dwellings of the official and upper classes, native and European, bear generally a heavy, pretentious character, which has no charm, and is only half relieved by the beauty of the palms and flowering trees, of which the city is full.

Government House, however, is a really handsome edifice, well fitted for the abode of her Majesty's Viceroys, with its sweeping front and flanks, its lofty dome, great gateways, and magnificent halls and saloons, the windows of which look upon splendid clusters of trees, flowery parterres, and over these to the Maidan, where half-a-dozen bygone Governors-General sit in artistic bronze upon colossal war-horses. Yet none can wonder if Viceroys and Vice-queens of taste prefer the seclusion and purer air of Barrackpore, the riverside villegiatura of the Government, situated about twelve miles up the Ganges. We enjoyed the honour of going thither in Lord Dufferin's steam launch, in company with Lady Dufferin and the house party, which was making its weekly flitting into the country. The great river—sweeping down from the Himalayas, and carrying in its vast volume of water that thick suspended yellow alluvium, washed from a thousand districts, which gradually builds up the islands and swamps of the Sunderbunds—was crowded with shipping, and full of picturesque striped and hooded boats, brightly painted, darting along with the tide, all steered by a huge oar lashed to the stern. An immense river population—busy as that on land, and as clamorous—well illustrated the enormous commerce of the Ganges Valley; for though the railway brings down the costlier articles, such as silk and opium, the water-channel is perpetually thronged with large and small craft laden with cotton, indigo, grain, jute, dyewoods, timber, fuel, hay; and, indeed, a dhow carrying 500 maunds can be hired for the voyage from Patna at the rate of about 45 rupees. Just beyond the bridge of boats we passed the Neemtollah Burning Ghât, where four or five funeral pyres are always sending their sad wreaths of smoke into the sky. In these upper reaches the Ganges becomes, of course, less crowded; and its low banks begin to show lines of villas, temples, and rural palaces in place of interminable “go-downs” and offices. Save, however, for the palms and bamboos upon either shore, for the shoal-poles, the caïque-like dingheys of the fishing and ferry people, and the scarlet-clad, dusky-skinned crew of our Viceregal launch we might sometimes almost believe ourselves hereabouts off Putney. There are alligators, nevertheless, in these quiet waters, and dangerous aquatic snakes, nor would one need to go very far into the jungle behind the Bengalee villages clustered under the foliage to find deer, wild hogs, and even tigers.

The pleasant demesne at Barrackpore is approached by a superb avenue of bamboos, planted by Lady

Lytton, and now ripened into a long green feathery bower, sifting the sunlight into coolness, which leads from the private pier to the extensive and beautiful grounds of the palace. There is a central residence for the family, and separate bungalows scattered about the park for visitors; but the lunch-table has been set to-day under one of the most noble specimens of the banyan tree to be seen in India. This is the species which sends down aerial roots, striking into the ground and forming new trunks, and these again make fresh branches and rootlets, until a colonnade of arboreal pillars is created, roofed with a vault of dark glittering green. The name of this Indian fig is Aswattha, and the Bhagavad-Gîta says of it: "Who knows the Aswattha knows Veds and all;" because the tree is an emblem of the life of man, who, growing to maturity in the air and sunlight of the sense-world, throws forth ever and ever new roots to bind himself more and more to the earth and its allurements. My "Song Celestial" says—from the Sanskrit:

"Its branches shoot to heaven and sink to earth,
Even as the deeds of men, which take their birth
From qualities: its silver sprays and blooms,
And all the eager verdure of its girth,

"Leap to quick life at kiss of sun and air,
As men's lives quicken to the temptings fair
Of wooing sense: its hanging rootlets seek
The soil beneath, helping to hold it there,

"As actions wrought amid this world of men
Bind them by ever-tightening bonds again.
If ye knew well the teaching of the Tree,
What its shape saith; and whence its springs; and then

“How it must end, and all the ills of it,
The axe of sharp Detachment ye would whet,
And cleave the clinging snaky roots, and lay
This Aswattha of sense-life low,—to set

“New growths upspringing to that happier sky,—
Which they who reach shall have no day to die,
Nor fade away, nor fall—to Him, I mean,
FATHER and FIRST, Who made the mystery

“Of old Creation ; for to Him come they
From passion and from dreams who break away ;
Who part the bonds constraining them to flesh,
And,—Him, the Highest, worshipping alway—

“No longer grow at mercy of what breeze
Of summer pleasure stirs the sleeping trees,
What blast of tempest tears them, bough and stem :
To the eternal world pass such as these !

“Another Sun gleams there ! another Moon !
Another Light,—not Dusk, nor Dawn, nor Noon—
Which they who once behold return no more ;
They have attained My rest, My utmost boon.”

In that natural banquet-hall of the Aswattha our table was deliciously shaded, and, moreover, all the other famous trees of India are to be seen in the Barrackpore Park. Walking under their shade after tiffin, I came with Her Excellency to the lovely spot where Lady Canning lies buried on a verdant lawn overlooking the swift river, her tombstone, which bears a touching inscription, being guarded by a handsome railing, and wreathed with Indian and English flowers. The place, full of suggestive thoughts, inspired an interesting conversation upon the old subjects of life and death, in which I heard more gentle wisdom than I could contribute to our discussion; and was rather the instructed than the teacher. The Viceroy, this week, was not with us at Barrackpore, having gone up to Delhi to take part in the great military display; but I had also enjoyed the privilege of much conversation with him on the previous days at his dinner-table and in his private apartments, and was rejoiced to find he had quite thrown off the slight feverish attack sustained in his previous tour. It would be difficult to name a life more valuable to India and the Empire than that of our present most accomplished and sagacious Viceroy; one of the few who has had nothing to learn in the East either as regards noble manners or consummate diplomacy. Lord Dufferin was busily acquiring Persian—as being the Court language of his vast dominions—during his leisure hours; and had already attained such mastery of it that he could easily follow a Persian translation from the Alf Leila, recited to him by his Munshi.

I had the further pleasure of meeting in Calcutta the principal members of the Legislative Council; and if politics came into the scope of these light and desultory chapters, I might, with proper reserves, say much, from the official points of view, of the income-tax, of Burmah, of the depreciated rupee, of finance generally, of local armies, of the Candahar railway—which must be made—and of many another profoundly important topic. It was also the good fortune of myself and my wife and daughter to gain the friendship of many native noblemen and gentlemen, such as the Raja Sir Sourindro Mohun Tagore, C.I.E., his brother the Maharaja Jotindro Tagore, and the Prince Wajed Ali of Oudh; besides meeting old and valued Calcutta acquaintances like Mr. Abdur Rahman, son of the Prime Minister of Bhopal; Mr. Mozoomdar; the Baboo Sarat Chandra Das, famous for his journey to Lhasa; and Moungh Hla Oung, of Rangoon. I had also the honour and advantage of being invited to an assembly of the principal members of the British Indian Association in their council room, and derived much profit from hearing their lucid and generally very reasonable views upon local and imperial topics. In the spacious city house of the Raja, Sir Sourindro Tajore—the first authority upon Hindu music—we further heard excellent performers play upon the sitar, the vina, the bansuli, the tamboora, and other indigenous instruments, becoming thus comparatively familiar with the râgs, râginis, ghazals, and other classical melodies of the Indian school, which certainly possesses great and subtle beauties, acknowledged by all good judges. Another singular pleasure was to witness a performance of the “Light of Asia,” played by a native company to an audience of Calcutta citizens, whose close attention to the long soliloquies, and quick appreciation of all the chief incidents of the story, gave a high idea of their intelligence, and proved how metaphysical by nature these Hindu people are. The stage appliances were deficient to a point incredible for a London manager; and the mise en scène sometimes almost laughable in simplicity. Nevertheless there was a refinement and imaginative-Mosenbach.

THE EDEN GARDENS, CALCUTTA.

ness in the acting, as well as an artistic sense entirely remarkable, and the female performers proved quite as good as the male. The Botanical Gardens of Calcutta, with their mahogany trees and splendid palm groups; the pretty Eden Gardens; the King of Oude's Palace and his weird "Snakery" in Garden Reach; the Lal Bazaar; the suburban villages embowered in shadowy tropical groves, and planted by pools covered with crimson and white lotuses and the blue nelumbium; the Bengalee men, in appearance exactly like ancient Romans, with their toga-like garments and bare black heads, but really the most unwarlike race in the world; the long lines of steamers and sailing ships, the fort, the monuments, the fashionable drives, and the mosquitoes, have been too often described for repetition. Calcutta is a great and busy Indian Liverpool, built on a swamp, and dignified with the style and title of capital by reason of having become the seat of government.

We sailed from the "City of Palaces" for Madras and Colombo, by the steamer Rewa, of the British India Navigation Company, a splendid vessel of 4200 tons, fitted with every desirable comfort, and commanded by one of the most courteous of captains; well manned, officered, and disciplined. The Rewa was bound for London; but this enterprising company has also the coasting trade of India in its hands, and bears with its fine fleet a large part in developing the commerce of the East. Steam has deprived of its old terrors the run down the "Calcutta River;" yet is this still a somewhat delicate navigation, and we took on board before starting one of those famous Hooghly pilots, who draw the stipend of a judge, and are at the head of their profession. The long steamer was backed out from her berth, and dropped down on the swift tide, stern foremost, so as to be able at any moment—amid the crowded craft—to steam hard ahead, and stop her way. It was not until we had arrived at a broad and quiet reach that the ship was at last swung with her head down stream. Thus we passed the King of Oudh's gardens, and the red and blue roofs of his rambling palace, with tens of thousands of pigeons flying about them; the fleet of the Peninsular and Oriental Company's fine steamers moored off Kalighat; the dark groves of the Botanical Gardens, and countless Bengalee villages in the river reaches below them, each nestling under its knot of palmyra trees and bamboos.

At certain points a swirl and eddy of the broad stream marked the head of some sand dangerous to navigation; but the chief peril is reached at the "James and Mary" bank. This is a shoal thrown up by two tidal currents meeting the broad stream of the Ganges, so that, while the depth of the river is seriously shallowed, there runs at all times, except at high and low water, a frightful "rip," which will tear the steering-gear of a ship to pieces, and fling her broadside on the sand, where she will roll over and over, smashing her masts, drowning her company, and disappearing entirely in a few hours. More than one fine vessel has thus been totally lost on this death-trap, the real name of which is Jal-mari, or "the Striking of the Waters." Pilots seek to pass it as nearly as possible at high water, but then, too often, there is a throng of ships, steaming or towing, trying also to go through; and if one should come to grief, the others may be gravely embarrassed. Above and below the "James and Mary" are difficult points which oblige a pilot to go forward, once committed to the passage, while the capricious river is constantly altering the soundings and causing the buoys to be shifted. Our captain recounts, how, on a rainy and misty morning, with a large steamer to carry through, the leadsman suddenly called out a foot of water less than was expected, at the moment when the vessel was in a position where she could not be stopped. There was nothing to do except hold her firmly to the middle of the channel, clap on full steam, and trust to plough through the mud; which was successfully accomplished, the captain himself taking the wheel; but if the ship had hung for an instant, she might too easily have broached to, and rolled over. We negotiated this dreaded bank alone, and without any difficulty, piloted by the skilful Mr. Daly, who has had thirty-five years' acquaintance with the whims and ways of the rapid river. Then we glide for the night into the broad and placid waters of Diamond Harbour, and cast anchor there, since no navigation is ever done after sunset upon the Hooghly. The ingenious pilot drops his net overboard for the prawns and delicious “pummelows” which abound in the muddy tide, and we haul it on the deck at daybreak with a couple of buckets of these fish, and also three water-snakes—two venomous reptiles of a pale ash-colour, having grey bands, and one a thin whip-like serpent, striped like a porcupine quill.

Getting under way again we pass Saugor Island lying low on the left hand, full of tigers, with which, indeed, the swampy Sonderbunds abound, and the Gaspar lightship, below which the Rewa comes close alongside of the pilot brig riding at anchor, and into her—with friendly farewells—we send our pilot. At this point the Ganges runs to sea out of the huge Delta formed by her own flood and that of the Brahmapootra—the yellow current being bounded on each side by the deep blue of the Bay of Bengal; yet it is long before we steam entirely clear of the turbid tide, always silently building up new shoals and archipelagoes.

Then begins one of those tranquil voyages which make even landsmen in love with a sailor's life. In January and February the cyclones which have their home in these narrow tropical waters are unknown, and day after day the Rewa glides under delightful skies and over a sleeping ocean towards Madras, every little flying-fish making a chain of ripples on the unbroken sapphire of the Bay; and the turtles in dozens floating asleep upon it. As the sun sinks over the Coromandel coast it turns the softly-moving sea into a broad sheet of ruby and purple, and you comprehend why Homer called it "wine-coloured." Not a sail breaks the solitude of the ocean, as darkness falls to close these perfect days and to bring nights of inexpressible repose and brilliancy, jewelled with constellations new to northern eyes. One thinks with something like self-reproach of those who at home are feeling the keen winter winds and biting frosts—one would like everybody to see and praise such weather of Paradise :

“ For, even these days of subtler air and finer Delight,
 When lovelier looks the darkness, and diviner
 The light ;
 The gift they give of all these golden hours,
 Whose urn
 Pours forth reverberate rays or shadowing showers
 In turn ;
 Clouds, beams, and winds that make the fair day's track Seem living—
 What were they did no spirit give them back Thanksgiving ! ”

Our Indian sailors enjoy this happy commencement of their long voyage to England, and think the days fortunate, which, indeed, they are ; for is not this the Hindu month of Paush Shûdh, when the Sun, having reached his farthest southern sign, turns northward in the Zodiac to enter Makar, the deer-headed Fish constellation, carved upon the ancient rail at Buddha-Gya ? Thus we are all now in that half of the solar year called Uttarayana, when it is good to be born and blessed to die ; when marriages are chiefly celebrated, and when all the months—until the orb turns back again from "the Crab" to begin the period named Dakshinayana—will be propitious. During the latter term the gates of Swarga are closed, and even pious and righteous souls arriving there must wait outside the golden portals. But in Uttarayana those gates stand always open. It is the time when the sacred thread is placed upon the young Brahman's neck, when new cloths and umbrellas should be bought and presented, and the cakes of sesamum and sugar given between friends. So we sail amid universal satisfaction, a happy ship's company, including even the monkeys, parrots, and spotted deer, which we are carrying on the deck; until the low eminence of St. Thomas' Mount comes into view, and the Rewa steams into the little open harbour of Madras.

Far too much favoured as we three travellers have always and everywhere been, new courtesies are ready for us here. The Governor's boat and carriage are found waiting for us on arrival; and we go off from our steamer for a sojourn ashore in Madras, through a crowd of masoolah boats and of the wonderful little "catamarans." Everybody has heard of those outlandish craft: three logs of light, porous lunnu wood, lashed together and propelled by a paddle, upon which the Madras boatman, squatted on his hams, pushes fearlessly off to sea through the wildest breakers, riding them like a sea-gull. The hardihood of these natives and the strength and energy of the wild, naked masoolah boatmen—who drive their big open sewn craft over the waves with oars like soup-ladles—are truly admirable. It was notably warmer in Madras, even in the shaded rooms of Government House, than in Calcutta, and residents say that the city is never really cool; but the apartments of Mr. Grant Duff's palace are spacious and luxurious, and the park surrounding it (full of the trees and flowers which his Excellency knows so well, and tenanted by herds of tame antelope and spotted deer) affords delightful rambles. Such superficial impressions of the city and its surroundings as a brief stay can impart are decidedly favourable. Madras—though it sits low on the shore, and cannot keep its harbour walls good against the recurring cyclones—seems a bright and pleasant capital, with a Hindu population, strikingly good-tempered, industrious, well-contented, and well-dressed; the particularly gay hues of the saris and cholis worn by the women contrasting well with their dark skins—much darker than those of their sisters in Bombay and Calcutta. These people of Madras appeared really to enjoy their simple existence in town and country alike. In no part of India was a population encountered which, as far as passing observation goes, seemed to be so quietly glad to exist under the common conditions of human life. Their placid pleasure in the kindly soft elements around them recalled a verse of the Sikh Grunth, which says very grandly:

A ROAD IN CEYLON.

“The Beautiful blue of the sky is the Guru of Man;

And his Father the Water white;

And his Mother the broad-browed Earth, with her bountiful span;

And the sweet-bosomed Night

Is the black Nurse who lulls him to sleep with the stars in her ears ;

And the strong-striding Day

Is the Hamal, with glittering turban and putta, who bears
The children to play."

In such an instinctive sense of having the natural Powers for friends these Madrassesees appear to lead their easy, pleasant, busy days.

You see them laughing and chatting everywhere, frequenting in troops the race-course and the charming marine promenade which Mr. Grant Duff has bestowed upon his city, and which runs for some two miles along the sands of the Bay of Bengal. Here all fashionable Madras gathers about sunset, and the inhabitants come to stroll and listen to the band. The suburbs of the southern capital are especially agreeable. One would have to drive a long distance outside Calcutta to discover any such delightful embowered roads and lanes as your carriage will thread in driving to Nangumbaukum, or to Adyar, both within a few miles of the city. The banks of the little river Adyar presented a curious spectacle—for all the washing of the capital was being done there by a thousand dhobies, male and female, near the bridge; and the river-sands were covered with countless garments of all colours, while the air was filled with the thunder of a thousand wet cloths slapped upon the flat stones. Guindi is another very pretty quarter. Here his Excellency the Governor has his country house, surrounded by a delightful and very extensive park and gardens, in which I wandered with all the more profit because the losses and deaths, whether rare or common, were named and labelled. The botanical world will get, no doubt, very rich fruit from the scientific lists which Mr. Grant Duff has for the first of the Presidency, which he has prepared with unflagging devotion during the last few years.

Meisenbach.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, MADRAS.

 Yet how great, in the wide and picturesque grounds of Government House, it was remarkable to notice how many plants, trees, animals, and insects are common to the whole peninsula of India. Madras might, perhaps, take for her especial floral emblem the plumbago zeyheri, one of the prettiest of palms; and the agave, creeping along the wall, with its little blue blossoms. But almost all the other well-known Indian trees and shrubs were there: the papaya, acacia, tamarind, date-tree, and lotus; the mango, mulberry, paper, and bamboo; the chanderi fig-tree, which opens at midnight; the golden laurel, sacred to marriage and to battle; palmetto and long-petioled with the yellow and red molasses; the Citron sacred to Drury, the Bala to Victoria, the Indian to Alice; Siguanon, Moringa, and Nymphaea.
 Filling about them were the tobacco and the violet Madras and Madras varieties, which figure also in the French gardens, and the low water; while the coppersmith had set his magnificent store on the highest
 one. India is like an island in its homogeneity?

At Calcutta there is a race-course, where I saw some excellent hurdle-racing, and, what pleased better, a good number of happy natives enjoying the sports and enlivening them by their bright costumes. These races all took place before breakfast—that is to say, between 5.30 and 8.30 a.m.—as it is even in February too hot for out-of-door exercise after the sun gets high. When we had finished tiffin at Government House the amusement was to feed the brown and red kites, which, like the deer, are quite tame, and will take bread out of the hand of her Excellency the Governor's wife. "'Twas pretty" to see the great birds circling near in scores, and when the food was thrown into the air one of them, dashing with a keen swoop and thrill of wings at the morsel, catching it as it fell, and flying away with the prize, which it would eat in the sky, holding it between the feet. Among the curious treasures of the Museum, which the Governor has greatly developed, is a golden coin of Claudius, the Emperor, struck to commemorate the conquest of Britain, and discovered in excavating a foundation near Madras. What chapters of fancy might be written about this aureus, which thus strangely links the past and present of England's history, and came, perhaps, to India in the sloop of St. Thomas! The only fact that could be mentioned by me at all to match the odd thoughts suggested by this Roman coin, with its device of ob Britannos devictos—in connection with the same locality—was one regarding the famous old ship Mayflower, which bore the Pilgrim Fathers to New England. It has recently been ascertained that this vessel was chartered in 1659 A.D. by the East India Company, and went to Masulipatam from Gombroon for a cargo of rice and general produce. She was lost upon the voyage home, one of the ships whose history is linked with that of the birth and uprise of great nations, like the aureus in the Madras Museum. I could have wished greatly to prolong the pleasant and instructive conversations which it was my distinction to enjoy with Mr. and Mrs. Grant Duff at Government House. But the "blue peter" was now hoisted at the Rewa's main, and, once more rolling across the harbour in the official masoolah boat, with grateful farewells and good wishes we bade adieu to Madras and to our kind entertainers, shaping a course south by east for Ceylon.

XVI.

CEYLON AND THE BUDDHISTS.

THE fair weather previously described continued all down the Bay of Bengal, and we sighted the lights of Trincomalee on a placid evening, clouds of violet and amber being arched delicately over the distant Cingalese hills against a sunset sky of gold. All night we coasted the island, which showed in the grey of the morning a thick unbroken sea-fringe of cocoanut palms, backed by high green hills, and sometimes separated from the surf by a rim of red or yellow sand. Outside the harbour of Colombo a number of outrigger canoes were engaged in fishing, the boat portion of the craft being a mere knife-edge, with just room enough for the fisherman's legs, this being kept from capsizing by a balance-log of lunnu-wood, braced to the canoe with two bent spars. Such odd-looking craft, driven by a square sail of ragged calico, fly before the wind with remarkable speed and steadiness, steered by a broad oar; and, when the breeze freshens, a hand is sent out to squat upon the balance-log, so that they talk here of a "one-man gale" or a "two-man gale," instead, as with us, of having so many "reefs down." These fearless brown mariners supply

Colombo and Kandy with the excellent sîr fish so often seen on Cingalese tables.

The sun was already high when the Rewa steamed inside the new breakwater which has given Colombo a capital harbour, but quite extinguished the commercial prosperity of Point de Galle. Many large steamers and ships of war were lying in the calm waters of the port as we bade adieu to the pleasant company on board, and rowed ashore in the captain's gig. The streets of Colombo present an aspect very different from that of the bazaars of Indian cities, with their motley population of Moormen, Malays, Tamil, and Cingalese. The male portion of the latter wear a tortoise-shell comb, fastening back their long black hair, and a dark coat or jacket over a sort of petticoat of white calico. The women secure their hair in a knot, and are dressed in coloured plaid skirts and a loose white jacket. The Moormen go all in white, or white and red; and conspicuous everywhere are the Buddhist priests, in yellow robes, so draped as to leave bare the right shoulder. Many among these have mild, intellectual countenances; but lay Buddhists—who are very numerous in the island—cannot be discriminated by their dress, from Christians or other religionists. A peculiarity of the shops is that their sign-boards bear Portuguese and Dutch names in great profusion, although the traders are of pure Cingalese blood. This is because the old Batavian masters of the island, being rabid bigots, forced the Hindu and Buddhist people to be baptized, and gave them their own names of "de Souza," "Pereira," "Abram," "Van Hoeten," "Van Duncken," and the like, which are still retained by thousands of the native-bred population, though they have long ago reverted to their own beliefs and customs under the just and tolerant rule of the British. We have held this fair island of "Lanka" now for seventy years, and it has become a real jewel in the imperial crown, alike for its fertility and the contentment and prosperity of the inhabitants. It is hard, indeed, to understand why good Bishop Heber penned those very ferocious lines about Ceylon:

"Where every prospect pleases,
And only man is vile!"

"Man" is much the same in the beautiful island as elsewhere—genial and friendly if you treat him well; suspicious and dishonest if you distrust and overreach him; and the children especially are as comely and intelligent as need be seen, although growing up often under the hot sun and stress of poverty into plain-featured men and women. The right reverend and accomplished prelatè must have suffered from that temporary derangement of the liver which the land-wind in Ceylon is too apt to superinduce. To me—who came indeed to them as a not unknown friend—the Cingalese, and especially the Buddhist portion of them, have been amiable, courteous, and open-hearted beyond words of ordinary recognition. I have formed valued and lasting friendships among them, high and low; and shall always think with as much attachment of the gentle and pleasant residents of the lovely island as of its enchanting prospects.

It is truly impossible to exaggerate the natural beauty of Ceylon! Belted with a double girdle of golden sands and waving palm-groves, the interior is one vast green garden of nature, deliciously disposed into plain and highland, valley and peak, where almost everything grows known to the tropical world, under a sky glowing with an equatorial sun, yet tempered by the cool sea-winds. Colombo itself, outside the actual town, is a perfect labyrinth of shady bowers and flowery lakes and streams. For miles and miles you drive about under arbours of feathery bamboos, broad-leaved bread-fruit trees, talipot, and areca palms, cocoanut groves, and stretches of rice fields, cinnamon, and sugar-cane, amid which at night the fire-flies dart about in glittering clusters. The lowliest hut is embosomed in palm-fronds and the bright crimson blossoms of the hibiscus; while, wherever intelligent cultivation aids the prolific force of nature—as in the garden of Mr. Bayley, the courteous agent of the Peninsular and Oriental Company,—there is enough in the profusion of nutmegs and allspice, of the india-rubbers and cinchonas, of cannas, draçoenas, crotons, and other wonders of the Cingalese flora to give an endless and delighted study to the lover of nature. Any one, moreover, weak in the chest or vexed with chronic bronchitis might very profitably repair to the Galle Face Hotel at Colombo. The thermometer by day never rises above 84 degrees or sinks below 76 degrees; the nights are often cool, and each noon is tempered by the sea-breeze, which sets in very regularly about 11 a.m. along the coast. The average reading is 76 degrees for the year, and under this equable warmth the flourishing condition of all vegetation may be imagined. In such a paradise of botanists as the Peradenya Gardens one views indeed the glories of the greenhouses of Kew, all lavishly developed out of doors.

Moreover, the lanes and carriage drives of Colombo and of Kandy are continuous studies of tropical Nature at her brightest. Delightful it is to ride or drive under league-long avenues of giant bamboos, and palms loaded with green and yellow cocoanuts; to see the most splendid exotic sprays of bloom of all conceivable hues and perfumes running riot everywhere. It gives, in truth, a new conception of the bounty of Creation to explore those dark-green alleys of Colombo or Kandy—to cut a branch from the glossy cinnamon and taste its fragrant bark; to break out the new-veined nutmeg from its shell of scarlet mace; to send your willing Cingalese boy into the crown of the cocoa-nut tree, and to receive nut after nut full of sweet fresh milk; to buy pine apples a foot long for an anna, and get vegetable breakfast-rolls from the bread-fruit tree—to watch ripe bananas sold by the cartload, and see flowers everywhere of the loveliest hues and forms, which would be costly exotics at home, draping every cottage door, and running wild over every hedge; to find the grass beneath your feet carpeted by the sensitive plant, which shrinks like a live thing, and lays its leaves and pink catkins flat on the ground if your stick or foot touch it in passing; to rest beneath a jack-fruit tree, laden with vast scaly fruit, growing monstrously out of the trunk; to sit on a bench with the cinchona boughs on one hand and the graceful tulip branches on the other, and an avenue of mahogany trees behind, having twenty different species of palm within view; yet all this is what you may contemplate almost anywhere within the environs of Colombo or Kandy. In bird and beast life the island is not so rich as the Indian mainland. Even the black crows are less numerous than their grey brethren of India, and swallows, sparrows, with the green and red barbet, are almost the only other birds to be everywhere observed. In the interior is a brown owl, the Syrmium Indrani, which the natives greatly fear and dislike, and there is a red and green pie called Mi-kian which is always complaining—they say because the peacock has stolen the feathers of its tail. But you encounter nothing like the populous winged and furred communities of the continent, and this seems all the more strange since the prevalence of Buddhism in the island renders animal life in a great degree sacred.

It does not become me to speak at any length of the multiplied and extremely kind receptions which the Buddhist priests and people everywhere gave to me. At Panadurè, where the learned Weligama Sri Sumangala presides over the college and Vihara, a large assembly “of the mild Brethren of the Yellow Robe" welcomed me to Ceylon with addresses and speeches, one of which—immeasurably beyond my utmost merits—I shall have the desperate courage to introduce here, merely to show how grateful the Buddhists can be for any Western sympathy, and what, moreover, was the style of the Sanskrit orations made to me. It ran—

May you be happy!

Let this address of our elders and of us, who are the continent and ascetic disciples of Lord Buddha, be (acceptable) to the far-famed and distinguished Edwin Arnold, Esq., C.S.I., who, having come down from England, a land replete with erudite Pundits and many an exterior beauty essential to a great country, in order to enjoy the pleasure of seeing and honouring with presents the most learned and very Rev. Srisumangala, the Spiritual Preceptor of this people, has visited Rankoth Wihare of Panadurè, accompanied by his beloved wife and daughter.

You, meritorious and accomplished Sir, who have eclipsed the fame of other learned men as a mountain of diamond would the lustre of mountains of other precious stones, though born in a distant land, blessed with neither the religion of Sri Sakhya Muni of Solar Dynasty, the Most Holy Subduer of all desires, and World-honoured Conqueror of all evil passions, nor the intercourse of His devotees, have written in your own native language an elegant poem on His most holy and incomparable life, a poem embracing the close of His metempsychosical sojourn, as a noble Bodhisat in Tusitha Heaven, and the attainment of the Four Noble Truths, great and holy; a poem agreeing to the very letter, and disagreeing in no respect with all the popular Buddhistical Scriptures, the Canon, and the commentaries; and you have thereby accomplished a task which no English Pundit has hitherto wrought.

You alone, therefore, of all the English Scholars, are entitled to our loving praise.

Under similar circumstances it has been the custom of even the Buddhas as well as of other truly great and wise ones, to gratefully acknowledge the merits of the deserving. We too, therefore, most meritorious Sir, tender our heartfelt thanks to you whom we see before us now in the happy company of your beloved wife and daughter.

May you, with those dear ones receiving similar expressions of thanks wherever you go, enjoy long life and prosperity.

We, in conclusion, have the honour, illustrious Sir, to subscribe our names hereunto on behalf of all our superior and subordinate priests assembled here.

GOONERATANE TISSE TERUNNANSÉ of Rankoth Wihare, Panadurè.

DHARMALAKARE NĀYAKA TERUNNANSÉ of Kappina Mudalindārāma Welitara.

PRAWARANERUKTIKACHARIA MAHA WIBHĀWI
SUBHUTI TERUNNANSÉ of Pathradhātu Chaitya Rāma Wascaduwa.

WAGISWARA GUNANANDE of Dwipaduthama Wihara, Colombo.

These kind Buddhists of Panadurè had adorned their audience-room and temple with palm-branches and complimentary inscriptions wrought in flowers and coloured leaves, and provided shelter and refreshment for us in this charming seaside village, where Cingalese scenery may be witnessed at its best. After the far too flattering ceremonies of the morning had been concluded I had the pleasure and advantage of a private interview with the chief priest, during two hours or more, in the library of his Vihara. The inner doors were kept by two "chelas," in yellow robes; but an interested crowd of the "Brotherhood" gazed through the windows, left open for coolness, while Sri Weligama, draped in yellow satin, with his feet upon a footstool, was engaged with me in discussing the deepest mysteries of Buddhism. His gentle, measured voice, and kind, enlightened countenance were, like his talk, of the true philosophic type. After many questions about the localities in the life-history of Buddha, which I had recently visited, he expressed an ardent wish that the Buddhists might some day recover the guardianship of that sacred ground at Buddha Gya, where "the Lord" meditated so long under the Bôdhi tree, and finally attained his Buddhahood. He said that this place and Kasia, in the north-west, where the great Teacher entered into Nirvana, were two spots which ought no longer to be in any hands except those of Buddhists, and observed that he should deposit in positions of the highest honour the leaves of the holy peepul tree, and the little carved stupa of stone, which I had brought him thence. He was pleased to remark that the "Light of Asia" was constantly read in the Sangha, and that arrangements were being made to translate it into Pali and Singalese. Then we passed from such topics to discuss the metaphysics of his faith, Sri Weligama softly murmuring that the true explanation of the Lord Buddha's doctrines on transcendental points—into which he went very deeply—lay naturally beyond the mental capacity and insight of prejudiced theologians. We talked in such a way as follows: the Chief Priest asking—

"What do they think of Buddhism in England and Europe?"

"They think well of its moralities, most reverend sir! and of its compassionate regard for the lower animals; but those who are uninformed or prejudiced accuse it of two great offences."

“What are these, good friend?”

“Such people say that it denies the existence of a Supreme Being who creates, preserves, loves, governs, and judges; and that it offers, as the outcome of all virtue and effort, only the reward of a blank final annihilation.”

“And what have you answered, dear friend?”

“I have not answered polemical persons. I am too busy! I have told those who asked me, what I have said in my book, that the great Teacher never did deny the Supreme Being, but merely declared Him past finding out by sense and knowledge: unsearchable; not to be degraded by definitions. And I have also maintained that Nirvana is by no means annihilation, but life beyond the life of the senses, more truly life than we living can know, a “peace which passeth understanding.”

The Chief Priest rose and saluted me with a gentle and pleased expression, saying “Sadhu!”—“Well done!”

Then he began an interesting little exposition of his own view:

“Life will condense, by means of death, into its essence. Your wise men are not wise to speak even here of five senses. There is a sixth sense—the chitta, the mind. It is that which truly sees, hears, smells, tastes, and touches; not the organs. When eye and ear and nostrils and tongue and limbs are laid aside, the master-sense becomes all the more free and opened. It is in this as with the chemical elements. To-day they seem to be many, making up the world—hereafter it will appear that all can be concentrated into one, which takes many forms. How should there not be a Supreme Being, since all is Unity and eternally-existent? How should Nirvana be annihilation when our Lord had attained Nirvana while he still existed, and being already Buddh, moved about in the sight of men?”

I ventured to try him with a little point of casuistry, bringing as I thought into conflict the dharma, which inculcates duty to our neighbour, with the abhidharma, which directs that we should look upon all things—neighbours included—as maya, “illusionary,” and should give up all for the sake of moral perfection. I said:

“Resolve this problem for me, very reverend sir! for it seems difficult to my ignorance. There is a Buddhist, a Bodhisat, sitting under a cocoanut tree whereupon hangs ripe fruit. He is deeply meditating, and will soon attain Samma-Sambuddh, the highest holiness and wisdom, if his mind be tranquil. There comes by a poor man, perishing of hunger, too weak to climb the tree and pluck a cocoanut. What shall the good Buddhist do; shall he forego his study, break off his nearly completed progress to enlightenment in order to climb the tree and give his brother food, or shall he let him die of hunger and prosecute his sacred meditations?”

The Chief Priest lightly laughed and replied with the utmost promptitude:

“O Poet! you have not rightly imagined this. If indeed your Buddhist were so advanced towards Samma-Sambuddh he could be no more conscious of earthly things, nor able to be beguiled by them to good or evil, than we are affected here in our opinions by the cawing of yonder crows."

Furthermore, I asked Sri Weligama whether, to his knowledge, there existed anywhere Mahatmas, men greatly advanced in esoteric wisdom, and elevated above humanity by abstinence and purity, who possessed larger powers and more profound insight than any other living philosophers? He answered emphatically, "No! such do not exist! you would seek them vainly in this island, or in Thibet, or in Siam, or in China. It is true, O my friend! that if we had better interpretations of the Lord Buddha's teaching, we might reach to heights and depths of power and goodness now quite impossible, but we have fallen from the old wisdom, and none of us to-day are so advanced. The reason that we wish to honour you is because you have helped to make Buddhists know how much they ought to do, and to be, to rise to the level of their own religion. But do not look for Mahatmas! You will not find them!" It is difficult, however, to reproduce even a small portion of the intensely interesting conversation which ensued upon these and similar topics in that quaint old-fashioned Temple Library, under the passionless face of the great marble Buddha, with the two yellow-robed brethren guarding our philosophic conference, and the palms and bamboos casting their waving shadows upon a silent yellow-robed throng outside. When our talk was over the other priests were admitted, until the chamber became filled with light and dark gold-hued robes and gentle, dreamy visages; and then one by one the brothers advanced and laid olas in my arms, that is to say, choice and valuable Buddhist scriptures written on palm leaves and tied up in covers of wood with silver and jewelled mountings. I departed overwhelmed with kindness and with these grateful gifts.

On another occasion it was arranged that an address should be presented to me at the Maligha Kanda College in Colombo; and some thousands of Buddhists—priests and laymen—assembled in the precincts of the institution, which is presided over by an amiable and learned abbot, Sri Sumangala, the guardian of the Temple at Adam's Peak. An artist would have found a wonderful subject for novel and striking colour in the crowd of primrose and saffron robes and dark meditative faces grouped in and around the central hall, which was adorned with flowers and palm branches. After reciting the Pansila, or five Precepts of the Faith, and singing a Scitta Mangala, or Hymn of Good Wishes, the President delivered this all too flattering introductory speech—which, again, I only bring myself reluctantly to quote for its evidences of pleasure in Western sympathy:

“HONOURED SIR,—We come to tender you, on behalf of the Buddhists of this ancient and historic island, the heartiest, most sincere of welcomes. By your transcendent genius and under the inspiration of a noble heart you have caused the revered name and sublime doctrines of our Lord Buddha to be respected and valued by crores of people of various Western nations. You have thus won the right to our gratitude and devotion ; and our children's children will sanctify your memory, when some worthy interpreter shall have rendered your splendid sentences and golden words into our own vernacular. Though you, more fortunate than many great authors, have been rewarded even during your present life, by seeing your labour crowned with the world's applause, yet the blossoms that time shall not wither will be wreathed by posterity in your honour, and the historian of a coming age shall write your name high up in the list of the expounders of the Tathâgato's Law. It is a misfortune to Ceylon that as yet so few of our people have a sufficient knowledge of English to enable them to read your work in the original. But the rumour is spreading throughout Asia that a wise and eloquent friend has arisen in the land beyond the seas, and is shedding a moonlight lustre over the Dhamma which has comforted our people for more than seventy generations."

This utterly overwhelming address was followed by two others in Sanskrit and Pali, and then it was my difficult duty to speak. An accomplished Buddhist gentleman translated into Cingalese the brief sentences in which I thanked the large assembly and spoke of the lofty and compassionate doctrines of Siddartha, as well as of the necessity of studying closely the true maxims of the Teacher. Above all I remarked that appreciation of the deep wisdom embraced in some of the Buddhistic books did not in the least imply hostility to other inspired religions, which, like the sisters spoken of by the Latin poet, "had faces neither alike, nor yet very different, but all of them beautiful." The great crowd of hearers cried "Sadhu! Sadhu!" to this, in an enlightened agreement; and when we took leave our carriage was accompanied along the bowery road, under the thick groves glittering with fire-flies, by a large throng of friendly people—men, women, and pretty children. What could be more strange to meditate upon than this, that the lonely thoughts of an Indian prince, sitting enwrapt under the fig-tree at Gya, should thus create civilisations and found widespread religions throughout Asia! Nevertheless, it was almost a relief to escape from the too great kindness of our Buddhist friends in Colombo, and to exchange the moist heat of the seaport for the cooler airs of the hill-city of Kandy.

Kandy is undoubtedly one of the most picturesque of inland places. The native town, composed of long straight streets and low little whitewashed houses, nestles under a ring of green hills covered with the richest equatorial vegetation. One of the last of her native kings “bunded” up the streamlet which flows from the largest of these ridges, thereby converting a swamp and some paddy-fields into a pretty little lake, which gives coolness and much additional charm to the town. All round this water and along the wooded shoulders of the hills run delightful drives and bridle-paths, following which the explorer may find enchanting views suddenly opening from the various points where the thick verdure of the trees has been judiciously cut away. They are of all tropical kinds, the most conspicuous being the giant bamboos, which grow here to a height of a hundred feet, and the silk cotton, rearing its lofty branches, naked of leaves, but covered with red blossoms. Rattans and climbing plants knit and interlace this wilderness of stems; the green perpetual bower of foliage contrasting pleasantly with the red soil.

THE GREAT BUDDHIST TEMPLE AT KANDY.

At the side of the lake stands the famous temple containing the so-called "tooth of Buddha." It is a curious building, with a circular raised library attached, from the columned gallery of which the kings of Kandy were wont to exhibit themselves to the people. We attended an evening service in this edifice, and were conducted by the priest through some little frescoed halls to a massive silver door. Flower-sellers were offering for sale to the votaries, male and female, as they entered, blossoms of the champak, the frangi-panni, and the iron-wood tree, to be deposited upon a silver table before the great shrine—the only offerings made. Every morning the priests clear away piles of these simple sacrifices, which are constantly renewed, so that a faint and grateful perfume of delicious flowers for ever pervades the dark chambers. When the silver door was opened there was disclosed another silver table, and behind it a barred receptacle containing the sacred relic, hidden under seven successive daghobas of precious metal, adorned with the most costly jewels. The total value of these coverings must be something very great, for nowhere can you see finer sapphires, rubies, and specimens of the true Oriental cat's-eye than are encrusted into their gold and silver. In the outer chamber are two raised seats, where the chief priests attend to preach Bana, or doctrine; and a band of native musicians on each occasion leads off the service with tom-tom, pipe, and cymbals. The temple is ornamented with curious frescoes, ancient and modern, grotesquely representing the previous lives of Buddha and the sufferings of those who have been bad Buddhists; while in glass cases may be seen many seated figures of Buddha in marble, jasper, gold, and jade, and one which is especially notable, carved from a block of rock crystal.

On the other side of the lake lurks behind the tulip trees another important monastery, where priests are ordained in a long hall, furnished with mattings and cushions. I had a lively conversation here with the very intelligent chief priest, amid a throng of attentive chelas and temple-attendants in various shades of the sacerdotal yellow. It seemed as if they could never hear enough about the sacred localities in India which I had just visited, of which they knew so much by their Pali books, but little or nothing from direct description. In simple truth no children in the nursery listening to fairy stories, no Arabs in a Cairene coffee-shop absorbed in the recital of a "night" from the "Thousand and One," were ever so silent and attentive as those audiences of mine at the little Vihara by the Kandy Lake; and when I presented the institution with one of the peepul leaves from Buddha-Gya, they would have given me the moon out of the sky had I asked for it.

At this Malwatte monastery, and Asgirya, all the Buddhists of the island are ordained; though there are two sects, that of Siam and that of Amarapoorā, distinguished by slight peculiarities of ritual in ordination, and much mutual contention. Their robes of satin, silk, or cotton are dyed with the juice extracted from the root of the jack-tree, and nothing can be more effective, artistically, than a large throng of the brotherhood grouped under the bamboo and palm groves of a Cingalese temple, their smooth-shorn heads and brown faces and breasts contrasted with the primrose, canary, and orange hues of their garments. The soft glad colour lights up the alleys of the bazaar or the glades of the rural roads with a singularly novel and pleasant gleam. Everywhere about the green island lanes and the long low-roofed bazaars one sees gliding these golden figures, silent and contemplative, the disciples of the Tathâgato; but indeed the greater part of the population, the plaid-petticoated and tortoise-shell-combed people, are Buddhists, who hear bana daily from their priests. Every morning, too, you observe the acolytes of the monasteries pacing quietly in the streets and lanes with the melon-shaped begging-bowl strapped on their shoulder. A Buddhist priest must not eat except of food given him from a charitable hand; nor drink any beverage except water.

Subjoined is a very fair description of the sacred tooth and its receptacles, already alluded to: "Behind the plain silver table, placed to receive offerings, stands, dimly visible through thick iron bars, a large silver-gilt 'Karandawa,' or bell-shaped shrine. Within this are six shrines of similar shape, decreasing in size, and all of pure gold, ornamented with splendid cats'- eyes, rubies, pearls, and emeralds. The last two cases are quite covered with square-cut rubies, and the smallest of all forms a sheath for the sacred tooth. This is an oblong piece of discoloured ivory, tapering to a point, and about  $1\frac{1}{4}$  inch in length, and half an inch in diameter at the base. It is not the least like a human tooth, and more resembles that of a crocodile or large pig. The devout Buddhist still believes it to be genuine; but there is considerable historical presumption that the real tooth was seized by the Portuguese at Jaffna—whither it had been sent for safe custody in 1560—and taken to Goa. The King of Pegu, a devout believer, heard of this, and offered an enormous sum for its ransom; but the fanatic zeal of the Archbishop of Goa overcame the financial arguments of his officials, and he triumphantly pounded it to atoms in a mortar and threw the fragments into the sea in presence of the Viceroy of India and his court. It is only fair to state, however, that some of the best local authorities agree with the Buddhists in thinking that the relic destroyed by the Portuguese was not the genuine one, basing their opinion rather on the improbability of the tooth ever having been sent to Jaffna, than on the miraculous rescue which forms part of the Buddhist legend. The relic is rarely exposed to the public gaze. It was shown to the Prince of Wales in 1875, to his two sons in 1882, and on a few other less important occasions. When exhibited it is placed in a loop of gold wire, by which it is supported in the centre of a gold lotus; and the whole is covered over by a glass 'karandawa.' Inside this is a sitting Buddha carved out of a single splendid emerald."

We passed one pleasant evening in Kandy at the table of Sir Arthur Gordon, the Governor of the island, who had just returned to "the Pavilion"—as the seat of Government is styled—from an extended tour in his provinces. His Excellency showed me a small daghoba, lately found at Anuradhapoorā, which must have been two thousand years old, yet the gold of which it was composed shone almost as clean and bright as when it was first made. There are some wonderful trees in the Governor's garden. One of them, a Ficus Elastica, stretches its contorted snake-like roots over a quarter of an acre of ground in the most curious fashion, and the silk-cottons on the lawn present pyramids of gorgeous scarlet bloom upon their naked stems and branches. Here, too, are the "traveller's palms," which, pierced with a knife at the junction of the stems, yield copious draughts of pure water; the betel-nut palm, the talipot, the Liberian coffee, the bread-fruit, the cinchona, the cacao, and—filling up all the underspace—a most marvellous thicket composed of scores of strange and beautiful wild flowers which load the air with wealth of colour and delicious fragrance, though they also harbour the cobra and the deadly tic-polonga.

If, sometimes, the Kandyans are tempted to regret the days when they were independent in their lovely island, such a record as that which we saw acted as a play in the theatre at Colombo must reconcile them to the mild and just rule of the British. The following extract describes one of the twenty-four scenes of the drama, all the horrors of which were performed to the letter before our eyes in a strange musical sing-song by native actors. The incident refers to the last of the Kandy kings, and is dated only seventy years ago:—

“Hurried along by the flood of his revenge, the tyrant, lost to every tender feeling, resolved to punish the minister Eheylopola, who had escaped, through his family, which still remained in his power. He sentenced his wife and children, and his brother and wife, to death; the brother and children to be beheaded, and the females to be drowned. In front of the Queen’s palace, and between the Náta and Maha Déwáles, the wife of Eheylopola and his children were brought from prison, and delivered over to their executioners. The lady, with great resolution, maintained her own and her children’s innocence, and her lord’s, and then desired her eldest child to submit to his fate. The poor boy, who was eleven years old, clung to his mother, terrified and crying; her second son, of nine years, heroically stepped forward, and bade his brother not to be afraid—he would show him the way to die. By the blow of a sword the head of the child was severed from his body and thrown into a rice mortar; the pestle was put into the mother’s hands, and she was ordered to pound it or be disgracefully tortured. To avoid the infamy, the wretched woman did lift up the pestle and let it fall. One by one the heads of her children were cut off; and one by one the poor mother—— But the circumstance is too dreadful to be dwelt on. One of the children was an infant, and it was plucked from its mother’s breast to be beheaded. After the execution of her children, the sufferings of the mother were speedily relieved. She and her sister-in-law were taken to the little tank in the immediate vicinity of Kandy, called Bégambara, and drowned.”

This tyrant’s punishment, however, was near at hand. He ventured to seize and disgracefully mutilate some British subjects who were trading at Kandy and so rendered impossible the further postponement of hostilities. War was declared in January 1815: an avenging army seized Kandy, and carried the king a captive to Colombo, whence he was transported to the Indian fortress of Vellore, where he died in January 1832.

Since then Ceylon has risen to prosperity by her coffee-estates, and is now commencing a new era of industry with tea, cacao, and cinchona. The island is, in fact, one prodigious garden, where the forces of nature almost oppress and tyrannise the mind, so strong and lavish is the vegetation. This is most of all evident in the remarkable journey between Kandy and Colombo by the railway which climbs the central hills. Leaving the coast, you travel at first through interminable groves of palms, between which lie sodden but fruitful flats of rice ground and jungly swamp, steaming, and teeming with life. It is all one hotbed of boundless propagation. Every corner where water lodges or sun-rays fall is seen choked with struggling stems, furious to live and blossom and bear seed. Then, as the train mounts amid splendid highland scenery, the hill-sides and deep valleys display the same irrepressible fertility. Your carriage rolls at the bottom of one immense precipice of ferns and palms, and hangs over another clothed for a thousand feet down with this same endless garment of verdure, scarcely allowing the red soil and grey rocks to show through. Everybody must have heard about "Sensation Rock," one of these points, where the railway skirts an abyss thousands of feet deep, green from top to bottom with the lush jungle growth. Left to themselves, indeed, every road, every village, every city in Ceylon would quickly revert to jungle, so rich is the soil and sunlight, so keen the contest of these wild trees and wilful shrubs to live and thrive. There are great creepers here which wind round and round stately palms and strangle them, and parasites which get into the clefts of trees, and eat up their strength and split their trunks. It is on every side a huge tangled tyranny of the floral world, where man is in positive danger from the very plants which feed and shade him—an irrepressible natural wilderness of greenery, almost too thick and flourishing even for the birds and beasts.

SENSATION ROCK.

On the line from Colombo to Kandy.

XVII.

THE SOUTH COUNTRY AND "OOTY."

WE embarked at Colombo, to cross to Tuticorin, on board the British India steamship Madura. A parting deputation of Buddhists came out in a dancing harbour-boat to say "good-bye" and to bring the friendly parting presents of a begging-bowl and a yellow sacerdotal robe. If nothing else offers I am now, at least, competent to ask alms from door to door, and to teach the Bana in a dress of saffron silk. It was impossible to thank them and their co-religionists sufficiently for the amenity and good feeling shown to us during our stay in their beautiful island. Other boats arrived alongside, containing a large number of Tamil men, women, and children, returning to the mainland from their work upon the tea and coffee estates. Of these fellow-passengers we took on board the steamer more than three hundred, who found what resting-places they could upon the forward portion of the deck. They must have suffered much inconvenience during the night, for the passage was somewhat boisterous; the Madura being "down by the head" and heavily laden, and the wind blowing smartly through Palk's Straits into the Gulf of Manaar, celebrated for pearls and tempests. When Ravana, the Demon-King of Ceylon, carried off Sita, the beautiful and chaste wife of Rama, the Monkey-God, Hanuman, as is well known, built a bridge of rocks from the Indian shore to that of the island, in order to assist the expedition of the hero. But the bridge has long ago disappeared—with the exception of one or two very sacred and dangerous islands—leaving shoals and reefs which effectually block the channel for large ships, while the currents and winds are just as free as ever to sweep down, rendering this little voyage generally unpleasant. All night, therefore, our small steamer rolled and tossed, obliging the cabin-ports to be closed, in spite of the hot, steamy air; and all night was to be heard the “swash” of waves falling on board the fore-part of the steamship, drenching the poor Tamils, who are, however, the most patient of travellers, and soon dried themselves and plucked up their spirits when the morning sun rose over the rolling sea. They managed even to get up a nautch upon the after-deck for our amusement, a little Tamil boy dancing to the music of a tom-tom and of a rude vina strung upon a tin canister.

Tuticorin, the “scattered town,” is an abominable place to land at. The roadstead is so encumbered with rocks and shoals that vessels must lie outside, six or seven miles from the shore; and the disembarkation has consequently to be effected in a steam-launch, which, when any wind is blowing, rolls and pitches like a porpoise at play before delivering her cargo of half-roasted and half-drowned people at the little pier. Yet by and by we landed, not much the worse for the rough experience, and put up at a small and unpretending inn overlooking the sea, comfortable enough, except for the ferocity of its mosquitoes. Woe to the too careless or too sleepy traveller who has enclosed a mosquito within his protecting curtains before seeking repose!

"Not poppy, nor mandragora,
Nor all the drowsy syrups of the East Shall ever medicine him to that sweet sleep"— which one minute's vigilant search might have whilom insured. The crafty enemy waits patiently until its victim sinks into the first slumber, then it searches keenly for the unguarded portions which may present themselves, and silently stings and sucks. After that first successful attack the banquet of blood is assured, for the sleeper wakes to rub furiously at the tiny wounds, which only grow worse with rubbing; and rolls and tosses about, exposing new opportunities to the watchful foe, who henceforward "has him on toast." Every minute the hum of its insulting little trumpet is heard, preluding a new approach; and seems to sound like a fiendish mock, as the sufferer beats his face and arms in vain endeavours to slay the minute assailant. A violent blow upon one's own nose is merely followed by a new reveillée from the mosquito's horn, and it is useless to lie still and let the foe have his wicked will, in the hope that it may become surfeited, for then the mosquito grows luxurious, and lights upon one sensitive spot after another just for the pleasure of torturing. You wake from brief and feverish slumbers at daybreak to find yourself spotted all over with burning pustules, while the assassin, gorged and somnolent, is seen taking his ill-earned rest upon the curtains; and when, yielding to a spirit of un-Buddhistic but uncontrollable revenge, you immolate him by a crafty stroke, that tiny speck of blood which he exudes in dying has cost you more comfort and philosophic calm than twenty-four hours of peace can restore. Let me here state, that if you rub wormwood leaves—dhowna—over the face and hands, you will be quite safe from these microscopic foes. It is, meanwhile, a melancholy fact in natural history that only the feminine mosquitoes bite!

Tuticorin is a sandy maritime little place, which fishes a few pearls, produces and sells the great pink conch shells, exports rice and baskets, and is surrounded on the land side by a wilderness of cocoa and palmyra palms. Pliny and Marco Polo mention its fisheries of pearls, which treasures the natives still believe to be drops of rain or dew, congealed within the oyster shells. A voyage of eighteen hours from the hot luxuriance of Ceylon has now utterly altered the landscape, and its fauna and flora. Here you encounter once more the familiar birds and plants of India; the striped squirrel, the grey crow, the myna, and the kite are everywhere; and the black shrike, the bee-bird, and the green parrot haunt the red and yellow blossoms of the tulip trees. Instead of the dense undergrowth of Cingalese jungles, one sees again the wide open plains characteristic of India, dotted with thorns and mangoes, and clothed with green crops wherever a well can be sunk or the waters of a stream diverted. Tuticorin itself would remain almost unknown and unvisited were it not the terminus of the southern railways of the Peninsula, and one of the few ports afforded by the inhospitable Coromandel coast. The name of this coast, by the way, has been commonly derived from Kurrum, a kind of grain largely grown by the native population, but it really comes from Kara-Manil, the appellation of a small Tamil village on the seashore, signifying "Black Sand;" for, as this was one of the first spots visited by the early Portuguese navigators, the whole shore became named from the one patch of metallic grit. The "South Indian Railway" runs first westward towards Tinnevely, and then northwards to Madura and Trichinopoly, through a level and very arid country, divided from Travancore and the Malabar side by high hills—the Varaha or "Pig Mountains"—finely rising in the far distance, which begin to appear soon after the seashore is left. No towns of any importance are passed until the traveller arrives at Madura, one of the most celebrated cities of the ancient kingdom of the Regio Pandionis.

Madura, "the place of amenity," according to its Sanskrit derivation, lies on the high road to Rameshwaram, the sacred island of the Straits, and thus must have become very early a famous site, full of schools, temples, and palatial buildings. One Prince of the Náyak dynasty is said to have here erected or commenced ninety-six shrines, of which those that remain are striking examples of the religious architecture of Southern India. The Choultry of Trimul Náyak appears a good specimen of these, and a most extraordinary edifice. It is an immense hall, three hundred and thirty feet long by more than one hundred feet broad, all built of grey granite, and the massive roofs supported by one hundred and twenty columns of the same obdurate but everlasting material. These are carved into the most elaborate adornments, with figures sometimes grotesque, sometimes fanciful and graceful—but all exhibiting astonishing artistic power and prodigious toil. The structure is said to have cost a million sterling, in days when labour and material were extremely cheap; and as one wanders through its vast corridors, filled now with the shops of incense-sellers, and other merchandise, the wonder is increased to perceive that the enormous mandalam plays the part only of a sort of porch to the great Temple of Minakshi, or the Fish-eyed Parvati, which rises immediately opposite. This yet more stupendous edifice covers eighteen beegahs of ground, and has nine large and small pagodas on its sides and angles. Four of them are of great height, soaring aloft in the form of sharp pyramids, covered from base to summit with stages of elaborately sculptured figures in stone, which have been minutely and ingeniously coloured, and stand forth from a ground of red—so that each goparam looks like a mountain of bright and shifting hues, in the endless detail of which the astonished vision becomes lost. Range after range of gods, goddesses, heroes, and demons, in vivid tints, and with all their jewels and weapons dazzlingly brought out by gold and ochres, are seen mounting into the air from the pillared basement, where horses ramp and elephants twist their trunks, to the volutes at the top, all blue and green and gold. Imagine four of these carved and decorated pyramidal pagodas, each equally colossal and multi-coloured, with five minor ones clustering near, any one of which would singly make a town remarkable!

The interior of this vast temple is full of picturesque courts and dimly lighted aisles, where numberless bats flit about among the lamps, and figures of the wildest fancy glimmer through the obscurity. We were not allowed—being known here only as passing travellers—to enter the very holy places of the building, and thus failed to see the "Tank of the Golden Lotuses," and the famous "Bench of Jewels." This latter, if accounts be true, was a marvellous possession of the shrine. The candidate for election, to the Synod of the College, after satisfactorily replying to his examination questions, was told to seat himself on the bench. If he were a worthy aspirant it expanded of itself from a mere knife-edge of blue granite to a commodious seat set with diamonds; if unworthy, the bench collapsed altogether, at the same time flinging the rejected novice into the tank. According to old legends, the useful institution came into disuse about the year 1028 A.D., when a Pariah priest presented himself for ordination, bringing a remarkably clever Sanskrit poem. The proud ecclesiastics of Madura had grown idle and ignorant, and would have driven this humble yet learned aspirant forth; but he was no other than the God Shiva himself in disguise, who had come to claim admission to his own Sangha; and the "Bench of Jewels" expanded joyously to accommodate the deity. The story goes that, on beholding this condemnation of their order, the priests fled out one by one and drowned themselves respectfully in the Tank of the Golden Lotuses.

Madura is a clean and well-kept city, full of many other interesting buildings and of picturesque combinations of palm-grove and bazaar-life which would delight an artist. In its streets may be constantly seen, yoked to ekas and carts, those charming little Guini bullocks, milk-white and perfectly proportioned, but diminutive beyond belief. I saw one of them in the garden of Mr. De Souza, at Colombo, which was a bull, as symmetrical as any short-horn sire of the Bates breed, and yet positively no bigger than a mastiff or Mount St. Bernard. I tried to buy some of these to bring home, but those offered were not of the true caste; and the man who had better specimens encountered an evil omen on his way to my quarters. You must not do any business in India if you meet with a one-eyed person, an empty water-pot, a fox, a hare, or a dead body! Madura also produces the finest scarlet-dyed cloths in India—a distinction attributed to the virtues of the water of the River Vyga. In one of her streets is, moreover, to be seen a very simple, but pleasing monument, recording the gratitude of the inhabitants to a former collector, Mr. Blackburne. This is a pillar of stone, of no architectural merit, but erected to perpetuate the name and virtues of the meritorious British official who transformed Madura from a foetid and plague-stricken city to one which has become wholesome, agreeable, and handsome in aspect beyond most Indian towns. Every night a lamp is lighted upon this memorial, and it is only one of a thousand proofs of the benefits conferred upon India by the just and conscientious English rule, as well as of the solid appreciation felt for that rule by the best minds among the natives. Political mischief-mongers who talk at home, or in India, of the discontent and ill-will of her inhabitants towards the British are either ignorant or malignant. I have recently passed through hundreds of her towns and cities, and over thousands of miles of her districts—often wandering alone in crowded bazaars or solitary jungles—and have not encountered a single evil look or received one rude or unfriendly answer. In conversation with intelligent people of all castes and classes I have found the blessings of our strong and upright sway perfectly well understood, and repaid—not, indeed, with affection, since that is asking too much from Hindu natures—but with respect, admiration, and general acquiescence. There are classes, of course, which will always remain hostile, and India is an ocean of humanity, about the various seas, gulfs, and inlets of which no man can ever securely generalise. Yet I am personally convinced by observation and inquiry that the roots of our Râj—despite all drawbacks and perils—were never so deeply struck into the soil as at present, and that, while we must strive more and more to develop the boundless resources of the country, and to win the hearts of her people by fearless, but wise and gradual expansion of their rights and liberties, India at large knows well that she never has received from Heaven a richer blessing than the Pax Britannica.

From Madura we travelled northwards and westwards through Trichinopoly and the temples, villages, and tobacco-fields of the Coimbatour region; aiming to reach the Nilgiris, and spend three or four days in the refreshing air of the favourite hill-station of Ootacamund. The evident commencement of the hot weather in the plains made it all the more desirable to get a little "cooling down" before facing the long and torrid journey to Hyderabad, and thence undertaking the last of our many railway runs to Bombay. We arrived at Metâpolliam, where the ascent to Ootacamund begins, before daybreak on February 13, and saw the rising sun light up a glorious panorama of mountain and forest. Then commenced one of the finest experiences of our Indian wanderings. It is impossible to do full justice to the grandeur and beauty of that climb upwards into the bosom of the "Blue Mountains," or to depict the enchanting charms and re-invigorating salubrity of their broad and fair summits. Nobody can praise "Ooty" too much, or exaggerate the advantage to the Presidency of Madras of possessing this island of health, lifted eight thousand feet into the upper heaven of India. The splendid mountain mass measures forty-two miles by fourteen, mainly of granite, with deep valleys and ravines filled with rich black soil, where wild nature revels. As you approach that gigantic wall through the belt of primeval forest which girdles its foot—a tangled wilderness of tropical growth, teeming with wild beasts and haunted by malaria—it seems impossible that any road can exist to lead to the summit. But the sturdy little ponies hitched to the pole of the tonga gallop off from Kullar, after a vicious kick or two; and you begin to ascend imperceptibly by cunning slopes and sudden advantages taken of cleft and ledge, until you look down through a vista of bamboos and palms upon the plain and the fever-belt. The way lies upward through a long forest-clad gorge, studded with rocks and waterfalls, and surmounted by peaks which catch and hold the clouds. From the thickets on either hand monkeys and jungle-fowl break; strange birds call and sing behind the veil of the thick creepers and rattans; the cry of wild animals is heard at intervals, with the noise of water and an occasional crashing tree. At every third mile the lean but plucky little ponies are changed, and the ascent continues uninterrupted, except by trains of native carts, drawn by those hardy milk-white bullocks of Mysore with the crooked, coloured horns, which enabled Tippoo Sultan to make such long marches against us. Here and there occurs a native village with its little bazaar perched upon some shoulder of the magnificent glen, and parties of naked coolies are everywhere seen metalling and repairing the blood-red road, that winds for thirty-one long and wonderful miles skywards to Coonoor. You pass in this way all the zones of Indian vegetation, from the almost fierce luxuriance of the dark jungle of the plain to the figs, bamboos, and acacias of the lower spurs, then to the region of the coffee gardens, and, finally, to the tea plantations, and to a new floral world where Australian blue gums and wattles dominate.

Here—between Coonoor and the well-nigh Scotch bareness and freshness of Ootacamund—flowers and plants of the Temperate Region occur plentifully. Lilies and periwinkles and the violet grow freely, and there are whole glens filled with the great snow-white chalice of the calla. Coonoor is fresh and pretty, and finely situated; but it cannot be matched as a place of residence with the grand open hills and valleys of Ootacamund, seated under the green peaks of Doda-betta, at the elevation of seven thousand three hundred feet. On this vast mountain-top are seen scattered, far and wide, the white villas of visitors and residents planted upon grassy swards, laughing with lovely nameless flowers, bosomed in wild roses and rhododendron trees, and shielded from the keen highland winds by groves of tall eucalypti—which in the distance look like Scotch larches. Well-kept roads wind hither and thither among the numberless crags and mamelons of the table-land, and the pedestrian may wander by all sorts of enchanting pathways from height to height—now lost in a coppice of wild cinnamon and ilex, now emerging into the glossy green bushes of a tea-garden, now coming suddenly on a Munt or hamlet of the Toda people, the aborigines of these hills.

I became myself very friendly with a community of the Todas, who live near Ootacamund. I was even invited to crawl on hands and knees into the small square opening which forms the front door of their hut, and partook of buffalo milk from a bamboo pot in the bosom of a Toda household. The subjoined description of this singular race—which represents, no doubt, the original dwellers of India—appears generally accurate: "The Todas, or, as they are more commonly called, Toruvars (a Tamil term for 'herdsmen') number about one thousand, including women and children, and divide themselves into two classes—Paikís, or Terallis, who can hold all sacred offices; and Katas, or Tardas, who are the laymen. The Todas are a singularly handsome race, tall and athletic, with Roman noses, beautiful teeth, and large, full, expressive eyes. They never wear any covering on the head, but their jet-black hair is allowed to grow to the length of six or seven inches, and forms a thick, bushy mass of curls all round. Their women retain their good looks longer than the females of the low country, and many of the girls are exquisitely beautiful. Their dress consists of a short under-garment, folded round the waist, and fastened by a girdle. Over this is thrown a sort of mantle, or toga, which covers every part except the head, legs, and right arm. The tresses of the women are allowed to fall in natural profusion over the neck and shoulders. Their villages, which they call Munts or Mortts, are generally situated on some lovely verdant slope, near the borders of a wood. They breed no animals save the buffalo, nor do they engage in agriculture or any other pursuit, but wander over the hills, of which it is said they are the aborigines, free and unshackled. In their Mortts, the dairies form a separate building of superior size, which is viewed by them as sacred, and into which no female is allowed to enter. They have a temple dedicated to Truth, but there is no visible representation within; in fact, nothing but three or four bells in a niche, to which libations of milk are poured out. They salute the sun on its rising, and believe that, after death, the soul goes to Om-norr, 'the great country,' respecting which they do not attempt to furnish any description. They have sacred groves, called Teriris, and to these herds of buffaloes are attached, whose milk is allotted entirely to the calves; and the priests of these groves are called Pál-ál, from Tamil words signifying 'milkmen.' They are honest, brave, inoffensive, and contented; but, on the other hand, they are indolent, and do not esteem chastity a virtue. Their dwellings more resemble the dens of beasts than the abodes of men. A door about two feet high, and so narrow as almost to forbid ingress, leads to a dark, dirty chamber, where a whole family may be found huddled together. Yet, even here, in spite of their rude dress and not over cleanly habits, the beauty of their maidens cannot be overlooked. Their symmetry of form, and the tender and delicate expression of their features, enable them to stand a comparison with the paler beauties of the West. Among the most singular of their customs is the sacrifice of buffaloes at their funerals, attended with a strange sort of game. These animals, which are of a prodigious size, and far larger and wilder than the buffaloes of the plain, are driven into an enclosed area by a party of young men armed with huge clubs, who join hands and dance a sort of circular dance among them. They then with shouts and blows excite the fury of the herd, and at a given signal two athletic youths throw themselves upon a buffalo, and, grasping the cartilage of the nostrils with one hand, hang on to the neck with the other. Two or three more rush to their aid, while others strike the animal with their clubs, and goad him on to fury. After a time, when the buffalo is nearly exhausted, they fasten a bell to its neck and let it go. In this way they overpower the herd in succession, and then resume their dance, which is concluded by a feast. The next day a similar scene takes place; but on this occasion the buffaloes are dragged by the sheer force of six or eight men up to a mantle containing the relics of the deceased, and there slain with a single blow from a small axe. In the desperate struggles of the infuriated animals to escape, the Todas are often severely wounded; but the courage and strength they display is very remarkable, and it is a point of honour for those who have first attacked an animal not to receive assistance. Another singular, though not unique, custom of the Todas is that of polyandry, also found among the Nairs of Malabar and the hill tribes of the Himalaya. The brothers of a family regularly have only one wife, and the same arrangement is frequently, nay, generally, adopted with others not related. As a consequence of this, female infanticide was formerly practised, and though stopped for a time by the exertions of the late Mr. Sullivan, has, it is feared, been again resumed. Many conjectures have been made about the origin of the Todas, but as yet no certain traces of their past history have been discovered. Their language is quite isolated, the sounds of it are deeply pectoral, and it seems to have no affinity either with Sanskrit or with any other language of the East."

Let me add to this, from personal observation, that the Toda women, like all those of Hindostan, have beautiful feet. Oh, maidens of England, who pinch the delicate symmetry of your insteps and toes into tight boots and shoes, comprehend that a corn is unknown to your Indian sisters! The meanest coolie woman has a foot, perfect, unbroken, neat, and constantly washed and trimmed. Only the converts to Christianity cover the foot, and spoil its wonderful beauty.

These people live, in truth, the wildest life imaginable, amidst the loveliest recesses of the Kunda and Dodabetta peaks; enjoying an air without parallel for purity, and almost unbroken sunshine and solitude. They are destined, however, to disappear before the civilisation which has invaded their breezy summits, and curtailed the grazing grounds of their buffaloes. Yet the divine atmosphere of "Ooty" has already saved more lives than all those of the existing Todas, and will be hereafter the means of restoring many a weary and sinking servant of the State. It is difficult to exaggerate the restorative effects of that marvellous upland of the "Blue Mountains." We left the Coim-batur plain seething in the early heat of the Indian summer, and within six or seven hours were plucking the flowers of home in a climate like that of Perthshire in spring, a hoar-frost at daybreak overspreading the grass, and the rising sun shining mildly upon a sea of white clouds laid near and far upon the face of the lower country, through which a black mountain summit here and there lifted itself precisely like an island from the ocean. Invalids, it is true, might not be able thus to pass from summer to spring or winter without due precautions, and even "Ooty" does not, it is said, suit all constitutions. To the merely wearied or fever-stricken denizen of the Indian plains, however, it must be like Paradise to climb to the lap of the great green Dodabetta, and drink in new life with every cool breeze, and every change of the fair and peaceful landscape. If the Romans had conquered India they would have founded a spacious and impregnable city upon this grand upland, colonised it with veteran legionaries, and made a dozen easy roadways up from the Malabar and Coromandel seaports to the gates of their Imperial Sanitarium.

( 303 )

XVIII.

HYDERABAD OF THE NIZAM.

THE long, but never uninteresting, journey from the foot of the Nilgiris to the dominions of the Nizam takes the traveller through a good sample of the vast southern plateau of India. The country nowhere greatly varies in character. Numberless little villages of huts, thatched with the plaited palm-leaf, dot these interminable fields of millet, cotton, tobacco, saffron, castor-oil, rice, and grain. Wherever permanent water occurs in the form of running stream, or tank, or jheel, the native population clusters thickly near it, to profit by the precious liquid, which is lifted in all sorts of ancient devices upon the thirsty land, and rapidly clothes it with a rich robe of fertility. Every now and then in this Madras region one sees, under a grove of sacred figs, a whole stable of sculptured horses, grotesquely carved and painted; sometimes as many as twenty or thirty colossal steeds in granite or basalt being tethered in the enclosure together. Many of the wayside temples exhibit the same equine effigy; but unless the horses thus consecrated throughout the south are those of Aruna, the Dawn; or duplicates of Uchchaisrava, the Divine Stallion, created at the beginning of the world; or symbols of the Aswamedh or Horse-Sacrifice, what they typify is unknown to me for lack of time to inspect these curious monuments. Doubtless they are well enough understood by archæologists.

Scattered about the fields—where all kinds of early harvests were ripening as we passed—may be seen those machans, or raised platforms, on which all day long the Indian boy sits, with sling and pebbles, to scare away the flocks of plundering birds. When he can stay no longer he props aloft his cloth upon a stick to persuade the mynas and the crows that there is still somebody there, and puts up amid his crop whitened chatties on poles, partly for luck, partly that the winged thieves may mistake them for the turbans of vigilant agriculturists and shun the field. An immense movement takes place hereabouts, as well as in the north, upon all the lines of railway. The carriages devoted to native travellers are almost always full; the kindly, pleasant, patient people come and go upon errands of business, pleasure, kindredship, or religion, in lakhs and lakhs; with no luggage but what is tied up in 'the end of the dopatta or the sari, and quite contented with the wayside refreshment of gratuitous water, cheap bananas, green coconuts, or the sticky amrita sweetmeats. And, truly, a thirsty traveller might fare worse than to quaff a deep draught from the brown bowl of the cocóanut when the vendor slices off the crown with a stroke of his knife and discloses a pint or so of cool limpid beverage of Nature's own concoction, fragrant and fresh in its white and sweet inner goblet.

At Arconum, about forty miles from Madras city, a line branches off northwards and westwards, which conveys the traveller by a run of some hundreds of miles to Wadi Junction, in the Deccan. It was full moonlight as we steamed across the palm-crowded plains, under a wall of long, broken ranges of hills, at the feet of which clustered thick tangles of jungle. Here and there the hill-sides had been fired, and the bright blaze glittered through the night air, and crackled audibly as it wound up the wooded glens and over the sun-dried shelves of the mountain. The morning and the night in India compensate well for her somewhat too fiery noons. From the time when the Dum-i-gurg, the "grey wolf's tail," first shows in the East until the sun is a lance's length above the horizon the air and the fields are almost all the year wholly delightful; and when the sun has sunk—leaving the East all golden and the West all rose—the peace and softness of the land become again indescribable. On moonlight nights—like this of ours from Arconum to Wadi—it is a silver paradise through which one passes. The rocks assume fantastic shapes under the shade of the softly lighted trees; myriads of glittering fire-flies dance and flicker about the thickets, from which comes an incessant song of nocturnal insects—crickets, cicadas, cicadas, and Asiatic "Katy-dids"—chirruping and chanting their eternal little hymn of love. Has not somebody written about it?

“ High the moon rides, white and high ;
 The marsh and mountain glisten ;
 Such patient lovers ! Shrouded nigh,
 Their little ladies listen.”

One can understand on such a night of silvery radiance—cooling the hot atmosphere and turning the jungle into a fairyland of mysterious beauty—all those endearing phrases which the Hindus lavish upon their hours of moontime. Rat ma ka pet is one of their popular proverbs, “ The night is like the bosom of a mother,” and the fondest phrase which the Indian lover can address to his Dilkoosh or sweetheart is to call her Chand ka tookra—a “ piece of the moon.” The cattle and goats are now all safely herded away from the jackals, hyenas, and wild creatures of the waste, which may be seen occasionally passing like shadows in the patches of lighted maidan. A gleam of fire here and there, or the glimmer of an earthenware lamp, shows where a little camp of wayfarers have pitched, or a lonely hut is hidden under the sissoo trees. It is with reluctance that one withdraws at last from the window of the flying train, and seeks the fitful slumbers which may be gained upon the cushions of the carriage.

In the afternoon we reach Wadi Junction, having crossed the Cauveri river, passed Raichur, and penetrated deeply into the dominions of the Nizam. This is a true Deccan country, flat and dry, with groups of thorn-trees, and walled villages, and here and there ranges of bare and dark hills, monsoon-worn and crowned with disused fortresses. Where water occurs the villages thicken and the jungle grows into forest, with great timber-trees such as those amid which the gentle Princess Damayanti wandered in her quest of Nala. For this is Vidarbha! Here is the very region "where no kusa grass grows"—because a blade of it put out the eye of the son of a famous saint, who laid the eternal disability upon the soil that it should never again produce darbha. Here are the asoka trees which the fair princess so eloquently apostrophised; the jungles where she met the tiger, the python, and the hunters; and many a caravan of traders like that which she joined. In the society of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, I had seen Nala and Damayanti capitally acted by a Calcutta company. The characters were admirably sustained, but it is the native fashion to intone the Bengali text in a nasal sing-song which soon wearies the Western ear. From Wadi there is only a run of twenty hours to Bombay, through Poona, and down the Ghâts; and we should have turned westwards at once, but a gracious message of invitation reached us here from his Highness the Nizam to visit Hyderabad, lying one hundred and twenty miles to the eastward. So we accordingly got what repose we could during the night in a carriage shunted upon a side line, in order to proceed to the Nizam's capital by the morning train. The hot weather has now fairly commenced, and the vast plains of the Deccan glow and shimmer under the fierce sun, as our train journeys through Tandur and the thickets of Dadur, to the wild and rocky districts outside Secunderabad and Hyderabad. The country in the vicinity of the Nizam's city is all of granite and syenite, rising into lofty, broken ridges, or scattered in huge tumbled fragments over the red and black fields. Those "logans" or rocking-stones, which attract so much notice when they occur singly with us, as in Cornwall or Scotland, are here to be seen by thousands. Enormous crags of syenite, heated by the sun and then cooled by rain or chilly nights, have split in all directions, vertically and laterally, and the winds and water, getting into the chinks, eat away the interstices until each vast crag is changed and degraded into layers of massive masonry, exactly resembling the work of giant architects who have piled block on block to make a fortress or a temple. Sometimes these dissevered masses rise one above the other in the form of a minaret, or square pillar, the summit crowned with a stone so carved and fluted by the weather of countless centuries that it is difficult to believe it natural, and not the work of bygone Titanic builders. In a hundred places one observes a colossal rock balanced upon a pile of crags, and so eaten away by the silent action of the elements that it now rests upon a mere point, looking as if the touch of a child's hand might suffice to set the immense weight—fifty, seventy, eighty tons—crashing down into the jungle.

Amid these prodigious reefs and splinters of volcanic stone are found gold, iron, and precious stones; and as we approach Hyderabad one sees on the right the great rock of Golcondah rising above the black crags of the plain. Here is the summer retreat of the Court, and the place which is mentioned in the "Arabian Nights," and has become famous throughout the world for diamonds. This is where Sinbad saw the merchants throw joints of meat into the "Valley of Jewels," in order that the kites and eagles might presently bear them away to their nests, which were afterwards searched, and the great jewels found sticking in the meat—if Arab tales be true. Everybody goes armed hereabouts. The Neza-i-Arab, the "lance of Islam," and the Shumsher-i-Hind, the "scimitar of India," are universally carried; but, bad as the custom is, no great harm seems to come from it, and half the pistols and matchlocks one observes stuck in the girdles or borne on the shoulders of the Hyderabadees would probably be more dangerous to those who attempted to discharge them than to an enemy.

Hyderabad is unquestionably one of the most peculiar and interesting cities of India, although of no ancient foundation, and possessing no very remarkable buildings. Koolub Shah, who created this capital in 1589 A.D.—having migrated from Golcondah for want of good water—called it after his favourite concubine, Bhagmatî, and beautified the place with a stately mosque and the picturesque edifice called Chahar Minar, or the "four Minarets," through the wide archways of which the main traffic of the bazaars still passes. The name and memory of the Sultan's mistress have, however, faded away, and this thoroughly Mohammedan city bears a Muslim appellation. Outside its grey and white walls runs the river Musah in stony channels which are filled with a turbid flood during the rains, but at other seasons trickle feebly with a chain of shallow pools, where elephants bathe and the town-washing is clamorously done. This rocky stream is spanned by three broad bridges, separating the Hindu suburbs from the town proper, wherein all—or almost all—is Mohammedan in character. The long, whitewashed streets of the capital, with their shop-fronts formed by Saracenic arches; the mosques occurring at frequent intervals; the tall sculptured minarets seen constantly rising above the city roofs; the signboards bearing Persian, Arabic, or Hindu inscriptions; the names of the shopkeepers, and the multiplicity of beggars on the mosque-steps and at the gateways, give the general impression of a sort of Indian Damascus or Cairo. This is intensified by the busy throng blocking up the main streets with a perpetual tide of life; for here one sees perpetually the snow-white turban of the "true believer" mingling with the red tarboosh of the Mohammedan negro and the green caftan worn by the Syed, or the Hadji, who has made his pilgrimage to Mecca.

This population goes armed, as has been said, to the teeth—to the stomach, to the back and legs, to the neck and head. In truth, it is hardly less the fashion to wear pistols, sabres, daggers, guns, and spears in Hyderabad than to carry umbrellas in Piccadilly. At the guard-houses sit the Arab troopers, with long matchlocks held spearwise between the knees, and cotton fuses smoking. The Muslim "masher," as he caracoles down the bazaar, strokes his moustaches with the blade of his sword; the noble on his elephant lays his crooked tulwar across his knees; the messenger goes down the street with the letter which he is to deliver stuck into the sheath of his silver-hafted knife; the dealer squats at the shoe-mart with a lapful of poignards rattling against his rupees; and every fifth or sixth shop sells lethal weapons. The whole capital gives the idea of being, as it were, "on half-cock," and ready to go off at a touch into turmoil and revolution. It is, however, only an idea; and though the populace has decidedly an independent, free-and-easy manner not witnessed elsewhere, and although a European might be somewhat carelessly jostled here and there if he walked through the more crowded of the bazaars, there is no sign of turbulence, or any positive want of civility that I could notice; and broils are said to be of singular infrequency. But the sword, "the spirit of the steel," is certainly worshipped in a way which would have vexed Thucydides, who writes, in his First Book, that no civilised citizen should "carry iron." The armourers will show you johurdars, or watered blades, worth five thousand rupees; serohis, with edges viciously curved; abbassis, a sort of Persian rapier; asils, nimchas, tegahs, kirichis, dhopes, and nawaz khanis, these last being murderous-looking scimitars, which have the outer edge of the lunette sharpened. Their blunderbusses bear fancy names also, such as sher bucha—"tiger's child," and saf shikan—"line-sweeper;" and then there are jambias, with handles made of the camel's sinews; sikkins, carried by Arabs; katars, affected by Pathans; the pesh-khats, worn by Rohillas, together with little villainous knives named bichwas, or "scorpions," and karolis, tiny implements of anger and hatred which you can hide in the palm of the hand; marus, wrought of black-buck's horn; and the savage pointed chura and crooked safdara. I had all these bloodthirsty elegancies explained to me in the palace of the Amir-i-Kabir, who owns a great collection of them, and who pressed upon my acceptance such a selection of death-dealing implements as I should have hesitated to carry through the country of my gentle Buddhist friends. In fact a volume might be written upon the varieties of deadly inventions to be seen in the Hyderabad bazaars.

I have spoken of Golcondah and its great rock as being near the capital, and may mention that we had a memorable little dinner at this retreat of his Highness, the table being laid in the outer hall of a magnificent tomb of granite, erected to the memory of one of the Koolub Shah kings. The splendid monument had been unhappily whitewashed inside and out, but this could not spoil its stately proportions, its majestic vault, and grand outlook over the rugged hills. This same district, lighted up for our pleasant repast by the moon and the fire-flies, as well as by coloured lamps, was that which Marco Polo describes when he visited Queen Rudrama Devi in A.D. 1292. "There be certain lofty mountains in these parts, and when the rains fall, which be very heavy, the waters come roaring down them in huge torrents. When the rains are over, and the waters have ceased to flow, they search the beds of the torrents and find plenty of diamonds. In summer, also, there are plenty to be found in these hills, but the heat of the sun is so great that it is scarcely possible to go thither." Then the old traveller also tells Sinbad's story of the eagles and the joints of mutton. Tavernier, too, came hither for diamonds, and noticed as many as sixty thousand people, in and about the district, engaged in digging for them. The Koh-i-noor was one of the famous stones thus discovered, and doubtless there are many noble jewels yet to be unearthed in the vicinity; but the clue seems lost to their precise whereabouts, and the last renowned diamond found was the "Nizam," which, after a peasant had rashly splintered it by a blow on the apex, still furnished a fragment valued at seven hundred and twenty thousand pounds. The gravelly laterite of Golcondah might, indeed, repay a careful search with some results which would astonish the South African and Brazilian diggers. We, however, had no graver business at Golcondah than to banquet with the kindest of entertainers, Captain and Mrs. Clerk, under the vast dome of the dead monarch's mausoleum, and to enjoy the tranquil charms of the Indian night, and of the landscape softened from wild and broken ruggedness to a silvery amenity. In this commodious edifice one understands better than before why wandering Kalenders and enchanted Princes of the "Thousand and One Nights" so often take repose in "tombs."

TOMBS OF THE KINGS AT GOLCONDAH.

The royal colour of Hyderabad is yellow, and the royal flag is a banner of the same hue with a circular disc in its middle. People have taken this for an image of the moon, or a shield, but it really represents a chupatty or cake of bread. When the first Nizam was setting forth on a dangerous expedition one of his holy men gave him the loaf which he was eating "for luck," and the King carried it with the army throughout a very successful campaign. Ever since that date the Nizams have borne the kulcha, the figure of the saint's loaf, upon their standards, which was floating over the "Chahar Minar." M. Thevenot in 1667 described that central edifice of the city in terms which cannot be improved upon. He says: "What is called 'Four Towers' is a square building, of which each face is ten fathoms broad and about seven high. It is opened on the four sides by four arches, four or five fathoms high and four fathoms wide, and every one of these arches fronts a street of the same breadth as the arch. There are two galleries in it, one over another, and over all a Tewass, which serves for a roof, bordered with a stone balcony; and at each corner of that building a decagone tower ten fathoms high, and each tower hath four galleries, the whole being adorned with roses and festoons prettily cut." The main streets branch out from this curious structure, and exhibit more varieties of the Indian races, and, it may be added, more elephants, than those of any other city from Peshawur to Comorin. You see the Arab, short and square, with his silver-bound match-lock and daggers; the black-faced Sidi; the Rohilla, with blue caftan and blunderbuss; the Pathan; the Afghan, dirty and long-haired; the Rajput with his shield of oiled and polished hide; Persians, Bokhara men, Turks, Mahrattas, Madrassesees, Parsees, and others.

Not far from the "Four Towers" is the Nizam's City Palace, where we had the honour of dining with a large company of Muslim Court officials, dignitaries, and ladies from the garrison at Secunderabad. The Nizam received his guests at the top of a handsome flight of stairs, on a platform of marble, under a pillared portico looking over a vast, well-lighted quadrangle, surrounded by white palace buildings. His Highness is of less than middle stature, with dark expressive eyes and a mild countenance; and was attired in a black coat crossed by the azure riband of the Star of India; a diamond-studded sabre swinging at his waist. A brilliant staff of officials stood around, each of whom in approaching the greatest Prince of India made six several and profoundly low salaams, acknowledged from the Throne by a slight wave of the hand. At the bottom of the staircase were drawn up a body of well-mounted Arab troopers with naked sabres, which they advanced as each distinguished guest arrived. Presently appeared the Minister, Salar Jung, a very tall young man of thoughtful and intellectual countenance and graceful manners, who was announced with much ceremony; as also the Resident, Mr. Cordery, and General Salletta, the Italian representative at the Delhi manœuvres. The State banquet, served upon gold in the open hall, was quite in the European style, except for the profusion of pillaws and curries, in which the Mogul chef of the palace excels any rival. After dinner and coffee, cigars and betel-nuts were offered, and the Nizam left first, to drive out to Golcondah, where he was staying. I had the honour of some conversation with his Highness both before and after the banquet, and found him as high-minded and intelligent as he is gracious.

Next day was fixed for breakfast with the Minister who bears the illustrious name of his father, and has inherited the great Salar Jung's business faculties and large mental capacity. The young Salar Jung's palace is like all the chief residences of Hyderabad, a congeries of quadrangles and green palm-gardens, with open pillared halls, admitting the breeze, but excluding light and glare. No company could possibly be more agreeable or refined than that of the Mohammedan official gentlemen surrounding the Minister; and their uniforms of grey or dark blue, belted with gold, were extremely becoming, contrasting as they did with the small close-fitting<sup>e</sup> linen turbans of white, sea-green, and scarlet. One among them, Syed Ali, just appointed Director of Public Instruction to the State, besides talking English with fluent accuracy and the Hindustani of the Deccan, was a proficient in Persian, Arabic, and Marathi, as well as Sanscrit, in which last language he repeated at table with all the correct intonation, the Gayatri, or "Sacred Verse" of the Brahmans. On the same day we took tiffin at the Residency, an enormous building, with a façade and with flights of granite steps, as imposing as those of the British Museum in Bloomsbury. The Resident and I had some old Oxford memories in common, very pleasant to renew sub Jove diverso, and after so many years. It would not, however, be proper to touch here upon the politics of Hyderabad, albeit the air was thick at the time of our stay with burning questions, and a crisis at Court was, indeed, in full development during that period.

Political anxieties did not, however, check in the least the tide of hospitality which carried us from palace to palace and from entertainment to entertainment in this metropolis of Muslim courtesy and high breeding. One evening we dined in a vast shamiana tent, on the invitation of the Minister, by the brink of the Mir Alum tank, a beautiful sheet of water, "bunded up" under the Golcondah hills. Hundreds of coloured lanterns swung about in the evening breeze, nautch-girls danced and sang before and after the sumptuous banquet provided, and, having crossed the lake in steam launches, we drove back at midnight through miles of ancient tombs lighted up by the waning moonbeams and flitting fire-flies. Next day there was a breakfast at the Lingampath Garden, a pleasure-place of the Ameer-i-Kabir, the premier noble of Hyderabad, and brother-in-law to the Nizam. The scene here was very picturesque, and after the repast his Highness drove me through the blazing white streets of the city to his palace of the "Twelve Doors," where a guard of Amazon soldiers received us, well-drilled and good-looking young women; and the courtyard appeared almost African in aspect with ostriches, elephants, and pelicans. The Ameer showed me, as I mentioned, a splendid collection of weapons, old and new, including swordblades of priceless temper, and daggers with gold and jewel work enough to render assassination itself æsthetic; after which there were further receptions, tiffins, and princely dinners, calculated to convince the most difficult guests that the superb traditions of the kings of Golcondah are by no means extinct amid the granite hills and pleasure-gardens of the ancient realm.

I wish it were possible adequately to paint in words the closing scene of all this gracious hospitality—the dinner given by the "Nawab Saheb" on the night before we quitted Hyderabad. This feast took place in the open Diwan-Khana, on one side of the vast central quadrangle of the Minister's palace. Mirrors round the hall and upon the ceiling reflected the great square, lit with thousands of coloured lamps, the marble tank in the middle filled with Indian lilies, the long ranges of Saracenic arches running round, and the galleries and house-tops full of dark, admiring faces. In various parts of the chequered marble floor nautchnees danced; native ballad-reciters sang the deeds of the Koolub Shah dynasty; and groups of brilliantly-attired officials and chief attendants lounged about on cushions of silk and gold, or carved alabaster benches. Curious apartments surrounded the palace-square; one, the Chini-Khana, was covered all over with porcelain of every style and age, mandarin vases, Ghuzni tiles, Japan satsumas, old blue, and willow pattern, with Worcester, Derby, and Delft, a sight to enthral the votaries of pottery. Another was the Sila-Khana, full of ancient and costly weapons; and another, a painted alcove, glowing with Persian wall pictures of hunting, war, and amorous dalliance. At dinner the Minister proposed the health of the Empress, and his brother that of the Nizam; nor have I often heard a speech of more correct and elegant taste than that which Salar Jung delivered. It was with difficulty that we tore ourselves away from this Mohammedan Capua, where the only danger for a friendly visitor is to be killed with kindness. From the Prince of this great and prosperous State to those who so generously interpreted his hospitable orders, from our delightful host and hostess to the servants of the palace, we were so spoiled with goodness that it was hard to turn our faces westwards for the long journey to Bombay. This, however, was to be nearly the last of our many happy sojourns in the cities and palaces of India; and a run of five hundred miles through the plains of the Deccan, and down the Ghâts, brought our round by sea and land of something like seven thousand miles to a close at Bombay, where it commenced. "Hic longæ finis chartæque viæque."

I have neither space nor time to tell of our second pleasant sojourn in Bombay, of the feasts of farewell which almost outdid in picturesqueness and goodwill the festivals of welcome; how we made new friendships in the effort to detach ourselves from the old ones, and how the deck of the Siam was crowded at the last hour with kind people bidding us bon voyage, while Lady Reay, at whose hospitable board we dined every day for a week, circled round and round the steamer in the Government steam-launch, wafting us official good-byes. What voyage could be otherwise than propitious after so gracious a leave-taking? We experienced such perfect weather that I was fain, in gratitude, to send back these light lyrics from the Indian Ocean to her Excellency.

TO LADY REAY.

“On summer seas, day after day,
 We glide upon our windless way,
 By your kind wishes safely sped—
 All glass beneath, all gold o’erhead.
 Oh, Lady Reay,—with graces laden,—
 We knew his lordship governed Aden;
 But you are, evidently queen
 Of all these waves which roll between,
 And Neptune, when you waved ‘good-bye,’ Passed the word on to sea and sky.”

---

Herewith my hasty and imperfect notes come to a close. If they have borne too uniformly the tone of pleasure and admiration; if they have left out of sight the evils of which other observers speak in India—the drawbacks of official life there, the faults and shortcomings of the natives, and the little occasional difficulties of travel which egotists love to chronicle—I can only plead that they faithfully record our special experience, which was one of constant delight and satisfaction. We brought goodwill to India, and leave it with that goodwill doubled and trebled. I myself have found nothing but friendliness and courtesy among the countless millions of this land, from strangers, town-folk, peasants, servants, men, women, and children; I have witnessed a thousand instances of simple virtues—of charity, of domestic affection, of natural courtesy, of inherent modesty, of honest dignity, of devotion, of piety, of glad human life—have encountered grace and goodness in passing, as one encounters bright birds and fair flowers; have, more than in my old years of service, become endeared to this kindred and civilised population, whose intellectual and religious history is so noble, and the guardianship of whose peace and progress is Great Britain's proudest charge. It is not that the writer has not known the difference between an easy Indian tour in the cold weather, and official life and duty there in the summer heats and the sickly seasons. It is not that he is ignorant of the crime, superstition, and ignorance yet to be combated among the masses of the land. But a healthy man needs only to keep himself temperate and good-humoured, and to avoid unboiled water and chills, in order to enjoy the hottest days which India knows—it was, by the way, 100 degrees Fahrenheit in the shade at Sholapore on the day when we passed through that place—and for every trait of brutality, ingratitude or folly which can be cited against the Indian peoples, those who love and know them could relate a hundred true and striking proofs of their innate goodness. I wish that there were space to speak here of the Indian wives and mothers, among whom are to be counted humble saints and angels by the lakh—gentle, patient, laborious, faithful, pure, contented, cheerful, and affectionate souls. I hope some day they will be educated—but not overmuch—so as to know how to enjoy life more, and to save their babies from dying so needlessly. I hope that Hindus will some day respect their own Shastras which forbid that a girl be married against her choice, or before she is, orientally, of age; then wives and husbands will, in a large degree, select each other, and, the natural Darwinian law once coming into work, the world will see wonderful statesmen, sages, poets, mechanics and artists, and beautiful, wise, and noble women arising from the at present level ocean of Indian life; and it will be, as it ought to be, the pride of Englishmen to call them “fellow-subjects.” We must live as close friends and fellow-subjects henceforward. The time is gone by when we could hold India by mere force. She must be “ours” in the days to come because England is “hers,” because the basis and purpose of our sovereignty there are her advancement and her benefit; because the best thing for the two populations is that they should dwell sisterly, the stronger protecting the weaker. What is good for India, in the sense of wisely and naturally developing her social and political emancipation, must henceforth be gladly done, not, indeed, in the spirit of precipitate agitators, who, to hatch an egg, would cast it in the fire, but in the temper of all those sound and safe administrators whose unrecorded but most noble work in India is the chronicle of her peace, her expansion, and her present comparative prosperity. We never conquered India! No armaments could vanquish a fourth part of the earth's inhabitants; but the valour of our soldiers, the sagacity of our Indian statesmen, and the superb devotion of that civil army which year by year administers the vast peninsula with a fidelity and purity beyond praise, have won, and fairly won, from all the world—from Mogul, Persian, Pathan, Afghan; from Frenchman, Portuguese, and rebel—the task, lofty and splendid, of repaying to India the immense debt which the world owes her in the past for her philosophy, her learning, and her arts. Neither before nor after the sad times of 1857, neither in my days of the Mutiny nor now, did the common people of India even for one single instant ever desire to see the Saheb depart. They do not love us, except individually. As a caste we have their affection yet to win. But they trust, they admire, and they appreciate the honest gentlemen and the fearless warriors who guard them with a barrier of manhood stronger than the Himalayas. Nevertheless the time is coming when India must approach much nearer to us, must have larger life, and not only know England better, but be better known herself. There are no longer two policies—one which suits the Empire, and one which satisfies India; there is but one henceforward, to find and to follow—the policy, that is to say, which is best for India. With such impressions I myself quit for a second—perhaps for a last—time the shores of this beautiful land, from which I carry the wealth of so many new and precious friendships, Hindu and Mohammedan; but if those impressions appear, as they may, too hopeful and too partial—or even, indeed, presumptuous—my defence is really a confession, for I declare myself not so much her friend as her lover. I leave my heart behind me in leaving these Indian peoples, who have taught me, as I have wandered among them, that manners more noble and gentle, learning more modest and profound, loyalty more sincere, refinement more natural, and sweeter simplicities of life, and love, and duty exist in the length and breadth of British Asia than even I had gathered from my old experiences, before India was “revisited.”

9, Bames Mitter Road.
Bhowanipur, Calcutta

Edwin Arnold's Poetical Works.

---

THIRD EDITION.

Crown 8vo, cloth, pp. xiv. and 173, price 5s.

THE SONG CELESTIAL; OR, BHAGAVAD-GÎTÂ.

(From the Mahâbhârata.)

- Being a Discourse between Arjuna, Prince of India, and the Supreme Being, under the form of Krishna.

Translated from the Sanskrit.

By EDWIN ARNOLD, M.A., C.S.I., &c. &c.

TIMES OF INDIA.—“Mr. Arnold has, in fact, presented us with a new poem of beautiful diction and splendid rhythm, as indeed might have been expected from such a master of the intricacies of versification.”

MORNING POST.—“Mr. Arnold has once more enriched our literature with a treasure drawn from the mine of Indian lore. . . . If ‘The Song Celestial’ offers less narrative interest than other works previously translated by Mr. Arnold, it excels them in elevation of tone, the effect of which is rendered still more complete by the author’s power and grace of diction.”

LIVERPOOL MERCURY.—“One feels the better for a book like this which Mr. Arnold has given us. That fulness of thought and simplicity of presentment which everywhere distinguishes Eastern literature is nowhere more conspicuous than in this admirable translation. The blank verse is strong and yet pliable, easy to read and very musical, clear and yet strenuous.”

SHEFFIELD INDEPENDENT.—“In Mr. Arnold’s translations these exquisite melodies captivate the English ear, and lead one to wonder what they must be like in the Sanskrit text.”

---

LONDON: TRÜBNER & CO., LUDGATE HILL.

Crown 8vo, pp. viii. and 406, cloth, price 7s. 6d.

THE SECRET OF DEATH.

(From the Sanskrit.)

WITH SOME COLLECTED POEMS.

By EDWIN ARNOLD, M.A., C.S.I., &c. &c.

MORNING POST.—“Each new work of Mr. Arnold's shows his style to be as vigorous, his imagination as fertile as ever. He is unequalled as an exponent of the treasures to be found in the rich mine of Oriental literature. . . . In the first three 'Vallis' or 'Lotus Stems' of the 'Katha Upanishad,' the purest philosophical doctrines are conveyed in a species of parable, full of Oriental imagery and vivid colouring.”

THE WHITEHALL REVIEW.—“The poem is a great, almost a priceless, contribution to religion, to poetry, and to thought.”

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—“He has drawn upon the treasures of Sanskrit, Greek, Latin, French, and German, for his varied and interesting collection; and his touch is that not only of a cunning hand, but of one who feels that respect is due to what he touches.”

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—“Nothing can exceed the graceful purity, the sympathetic and reverent tenderness, with which 'this lovely lotus-blossom' is unfolded by its faithful admirer.”

GLOBE.—“The story is told with a truly Oriental wealth of imagery, and is no less vivid in its landscape than subtle in its philosophy.”

SCOTSMAN.—“Translations and original poems alike give proof of a scholarly and cultured taste, and of grace and dignity of diction; and not seldom of a fine combination of vigour of phrase with delicacy of thought.”

MORNING ADVERTISER.—“Every poem in the present collection will amply sustain Mr. Arnold's reputation as a writer of English verse of undoubted originality, versatility, and power.”

---

LONDON: TRÜBNER & CO., LUDGATE HILL.

INDIAN IDYLLS.

(From the Sanskrit of the Mahâbhârata.)

By EDWIN ARNOLD, M.A., C.S.I., &c. &c.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—“Nobody who reads the heart-stirring epics put into magnificent rhythm which are contained in this book can ever again affect to despise the people whose genius established such an imperishable monument.”

GLOBE.—“All the idylls are marked by the grace of diction and tenderness of tone which are among Mr. Arnold's leading characteristics, while it needs scarcely to be said that the style is pure and elevated throughout. The imagery, too, is full of force and fire.”

FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW.—“In his recently published volume of 'Indian Idylls' Mr. Arnold continues his task of interpreting to English readers the tender thoughts and graceful imagery of the East. The volume consists of eight graphic pieces from the 'Mahâbhârata,' one of the two colossal and unparalleled epic poems of India, which were not known to Europe even by name till Sir William Jones announced their existence.”

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.—“Mr. Arnold has eaten of the lotus-fruit of Eastern song, and finds it hard to leave it. And of this we are far from complaining, seeing that this taste of his has enabled many of us to travel into 'realms of gold' which we could hardly enter without some such skilful guide.”

NEW YORK TIMES.—“The 'Indian Idylls' partake of the same character as his previous works, 'The Light of Asia,' 'Pearls of the Faith,' and others, being deeply imbued with the spirit of Oriental poetry, and having the power of rendering that spirit in English language with a verisimilitude and force which cannot fail to convince the reader of the truth of its colouring.”

Crown 8vo, pp. xiv. and 320, with green borders, cloth, price 7s. 6d.

PEARLS OF THE FAITH; OR, ISLAM'S ROSARY.

Being the Ninety-nine Beautiful Names of Allah (Asmâ-el-'Husná).

*With Comments in Verse from various Oriental Sources.
As made by an Indian Mussulman.*

By EDWIN ARNOLD, M.A., C.S.I., &c. &c.

TIMES.—“Mr. Edwin Arnold has succeeded in producing a delightful collection of Oriental stories in verse.”

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS—(G. A. SALA).—“I am reading Mr. Edwin Arnold's book with intense delight, for the sake of its majesty and eloquence, its wealth and beauty of imagery, and its sweet and harmonious numbers.”

DAILY CHRONICLE.—“The subject is invested with fascinating beauty by the wealth of Oriental illustrations displayed.”

SCOTSMAN.—“Mr. Arnold brings to the performance of his task peculiar qualifications—great poetic gifts, broad sympathies, and extensive knowledge of Oriental tongues, ideas, and methods of thought.”

SOCIETY.—“There is such a delightful imagery and rhythmical cadence in every line that it positively thrills one with a feeling of abounding pleasure. The air of pure devotion, the unsurpassable power of description, the inimitable eloquence and wonderful grace, displayed with a lavish profusion, render this work almost peerless.”

VANITY FAIR.—“We cordially recommend this book to those who know the world of Islam and to those who do not. The former will be pleased to see in an English dress that which they have admired in its Eastern garb; the latter will be surprised to find how much the Mohammedan traditions resemble those which they have been accustomed to revere both in the Old Testament and the New, and to admire in some of the more solemn portions of the ‘Arabian Nights.’”

STANDARD.—“Mr. Arnold has caught the spirit of the Eastern original, so childlike and yet so sage, so simple yet so profound, so tender in feeling yet so strong in sense.”

---

LONDON: TRÜBNER & CO., LUDGATE HILL.

Post 8vo, pp. viii. and 270, cloth, price 7s. 6d.

INDIAN POETRY:

CONTAINING "THE INDIAN SONG OF SONGS,"

From the Sanskrit of the "Gita Govinda" of Jayadeva; Two Books from "The Iliad of India" (Mahābhārata), "Proverbial Wisdom" from the Shlokas of the Hitopadesa, and other Oriental Poems.

By EDWIN ARNOLD, M.A., C.S.I., &c. &c.

TIMES.—"In this new volume Mr. Edwin Arnold does good service by illustrating, through the medium of his musical English melodies, the power of Indian poetry to stir European emotions. 'The Indian Song of Songs' is not unknown to scholars. Mr. Arnold will have introduced it among popular English poems."

STANDARD.—"The poem abounds with imagery of Eastern luxuriousness and sensuousness; the air seems laden with the spicy odours of the tropics, and the verse has a richness and a melody sufficient to captivate the senses of the dullest."

OVERLAND MAIL.—"The translator, while producing a very enjoyable poem, has adhered with tolerable fidelity to the original text."

LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW.—"Mr. Edwin Arnold has bestowed his unquestionable poetic talents on a very worthy object in translating the Sanskrit idyll, 'Gita Govinda,' into English verse. . . . 'The Indian Song of Songs' is distinctly a new possession for the lovers of English exotic poetry."

ACADEMY.—"It has been reserved to Mr. Arnold to give us such a version as can convey to the European reader an adequate idea of the beauty of Jayadeva's verse. It is the best yet published, and is not likely to be soon surpassed."

---

LONDON: TRÜBNER & CO., LUDGATE HILL.

12mo, pp. xvi. and 240, parchment, price 3s. 6d.

Crown 8vo, pp. xii. and 294, cloth, price 7s. 6d.

THE LIGHT OF ASIA; OR, THE GREAT RENUNCIATION.

(Mahabhinishkramana.)

Being the Life and Teaching of Gautama, Prince of India, and Founder of Buddhism.

(As told in Verse by an Indian Buddhist)

By EDWIN ARNOLD, M.A., C.S.I., &c. &c.

INTERNATIONAL REVIEW—(OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES).—“It is a work of great beauty. It tells a story of intense interest, which never flags for a moment; its descriptions are drawn by the hand of a master with the eye of a poet and the familiarity of an expert with the objects described; its tone is so lofty that there is nothing with which to compare it but the New Testament; it is full of variety, now picturesque, now pathetic, now rising into the noblest realms of thought and aspiration; it finds language penetrating, fluent, elevated, impassioned, musical always, to clothe its varied thoughts and sentiments.”

MORNING POST.—“Mr. Arnold, one of the most musical and thoughtful of modern writers of verse, has given to the world in ‘The Light of Asia’ a poem which is for many reasons remarkable. . . . Entirely apart from the vivid beauty of the scene as set forth in these noble lines, it is worthy of note with what inimitable success the figure of onomatopœia is employed; it is impossible to conceive of anything more perfect in this way than such a line as that descriptive of the successive rises of the (Himalayan) precipice. . . . Not the least of his merits is that he writes such pure and delicious English. . . . ‘The Light of Asia’ is a noble and worthy poem.”

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—“‘The Light of Asia’ is a remarkable poem, and worthy of a place amongst the great poems of our time. Mr. Arnold is far more than ‘a coiner of sweet words’—he is the exponent of noble impressions. He is a scholar and a philosopher; but he is also a true singer.”

CALCUTTA ENGLISHMAN.—“In Mr. Edwin Arnold, Indian poetry and Indian thought have at length found a worthy English exponent. He brings to his work the facility of a ready pen, a thorough knowledge of his subject, a great sympathy for the people of this country, and a command of public attention at home.”

LONDON: TRÜBNER & CO., LUDGATE HILL.

Small 4to, pp. xx.—196, handsomely bound in cloth, price 21s.

THE ILLUSTRATED EDITION OF
THE LIGHT OF ASIA;
OR, THE GREAT RENUNCIATION.

(Mahabhinishkramana.)

By EDWIN ARNOLD, M.A., C.S.I., &c. &c.

With Illustrations taken, for the most part, from Photographs of Buddhist Sculptures and Frescoes, found in Ancient Ruins in India, averaging 2000 years old, many of them being identified by eminent archæological authorities, both in India and at home, as actually illustrating Scenes in the Life of GAUTAMA BUDDHA, the Founder of Buddhism, and the hero of Mr. Arnold's poem.

TIMES.—“The volume differs agreeably from most modern editions de luxe in being of a portable size.”

SCOTSMAN.—“Not only is the poem beautified by its illustrations, but the illustrations themselves have a high value for archæologists. . . . The illustrations are admirably produced, and in typography and in paper there is nothing left to be desired. Alike, then, because of its external beauty and its intrinsic merits, this book must be most highly commended.”

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—“That the character of these truly remarkable illustrations ‘will be fully appreciated only by those who have thoroughly entered into the spirit of the poem, and who therefore know how to interpret them, philosophically as well as artistically,’ is no misfortune to the possessor of this beautiful edition. While the engravings . . . cannot fail to please and instruct the general public by their revelation of antique and unfamiliar schools, they will materially heighten the zest of scholarship which leads the studious reader to a more diligent research in the subtleties of poetic and philosophic thought which abound on every page of the poem.”

SPECTATOR.—“A singularly well-printed and well-got-up edition of Mr. Arnold's well-known epic. The volume is not too large, as almost all editions de-luxe are, and its illustrations have a meaning.”

BOOKSELLER.—“The volume is illustrated in a very remarkable manner, the whole of the designs being literal copies of sculptural monuments of Buddhistic origin. . . . Everything about the book is in harmony with the central idea of the poem.”

LONDON : TRÜBNER & CO., LUDGATE HILL.

UNIFORM EDITION OF
EDWIN ARNOLD'S POETICAL WORKS.

---

In Six Volumes, crown 8vo, uniformly bound in cloth, price £1, 16s. Sold only in Sets.

THE LIGHT OF ASIA;
OR, THE GREAT RENUNCIATION.

INDIAN POETRY:
THE INDIAN SONG OF SONGS, &c.

PEARLS OF THE FAITH; OR, ISLAM'S ROSARY.

INDIAN IDYLLS.
FROM THE SANSKRIT.

THE SECRET OF DEATH.
FROM THE SANSKRIT.

THE SONG CELESTIAL;
OR, BHAGAVAD-GÎTÂ. From the Sanskrit.

---

For description of the editions of the separate volumes see previous pages.

---

LONDON: TRÜBNER & CO., LUDGATE HILL.